The second day's session of the Indiana Legislature was attended by a series of partisan wranglings. The Democratic Senate declined to meet the Republican House in joint session to hear the Governor's message, it having come to their ears that the Republican managers had planned a coup d'état to be sprung upon the Senate. In consequence, the Governor did not deliver his message orally, as usual, but sent printed copies of it to each branch of the General Assembly. The Senate adopted a resolution declaring that that body recognized no vacancy in the office of Lieutenant Governor prior to the last election, and refusing to join in the canvass of the vote for the candidacy for the office. The Republican majority of the House, in retaliation for the rules adopted by the Senate, adopted a set of regulations fully as arbitrary as those of the upper body. The effect in either house will be that the majority can summarily and quickly unseat any member of the minority, wittingly or wrongfully.

The conference of the Congressional committees on the electoral count bill has resulted in an agreement.

The expected trouble in the organization of the Indiana General Assembly began when that body was called to order on the 6th inst.

Green Smith, President pro tem. of the Senate in the last Legislature and present claimant to the Lieutenant Governorship, called the Senate to order. Senator Winter, of Marion, the Republican leader, shouted at the Chair for several minutes, while the latter was demanding that Senators come to order. Finally he rose to question of privilege, and was then surrounded by Smith and announced that the Senate would be opened with prayer by Bishop Kindelberger. The Democratic members stood in the galleries, but the Republicans, desiring not to recognize any of the proceedings at this stage as binding upon them, did not. Mr. Winter continued to protest during a portion of the prayer. The law provides that in the absence of the Lieutenant Governor the Auditor of State shall call the Senate to order, but the Democrats claimed that as the Lieutenant Governor was a member of the party of Green Smith this provision did not apply, and proceeded accordingly. After the arrival of the newly elected Senators were sworn in by Supreme Judge Zoërs, whereupon Senator Johnson, Republican, said: "I desire to suggest that an election of Chairman is the only thing now in order." The Chair: "And I desire to suggest to you take your seat and keep it." The senator took his seat and the majority were allowed to have their own way in the subsequent proceedings without much resistance on the part of the opposition. A resolution was moved and carried that Smith, President of the Senate, be given a seat on the floor, as signifying a settled purpose on the part of the Democrats to hold on to the Chairmanship of the Senate and compel Colonel Robertson, the Lieutenant Governor-elect, to resort to quo warrant proceedings to secure the position. The action was clinched by the usual parliamentary motions, and the Senate proceeded to adopt a code of iron-clad rules, which were put through under the previous question. These rules were carefully framed to guard against every contingency likely to arise in the event that Robertson gets the chair.

The new Governor of Massachusetts, in his inaugural message, takes a somewhat novel position in the matter of temperance. Instead of advocating a prohibition amendment to the State Constitution, as it was expected he would do, he recognizes license as the law of the State, and recommends that the number of licenses issued in cities shall be restricted to narrow limits by law, and that by law also the fees for licenses shall be greatly increased. This scheme can hardly be said to be a practical one, as it would at once create a monopoly in the liquor business by law which could not help but become unpopular.

The Secretary of State has received a dispatch from Frederick Raine, United States Consul at Berlin, setting forth the annoyances to which United States citizens visiting Europe, and especially Germany, subject themselves by neglecting to secure passports before leaving this country. Berlin, Frankfurt, Hamburg, Leipzig and other cities of the German Empire are subjected to a so-called "all state of siege," and every stranger or foreigner visiting these places is required to identify himself by producing a passport; ladies are not excepted. Immediately after the arrival of a stranger the police authorities demand the production of a passport, and if he is not provided with one he must either procure one at the nearest United States legation or submit to annoyances, if not a peremptory order to leave. No stranger can enter the dominions of the Russian Empire without a passport, while in several places of Austria, Italy, etc., similar prohibitory measures are enforced.
