Matthews as an Orator.

Governor Matthews has made many great speeches, all couched in the most pleasing language, and most beautifully expressing the sentiments of patriotism. His speech at the dedication of Chickamauga was no exception, and will rank well with the best productions of the great orators.

"Is it a wonder," said he, "that we are here to honor heroes living and heroes dead? That a great state, in grateful remembrance, should erect monuments commemorative of the valor of her sons? We will weave the willow in our garland of triumph, and in the poem of victory mingle a sigh for the dead. It is fitting that here should be established a great national park, for of all the battles of the war this was a national battle ground. Twenty-eight states of the Union sent their sons to contend for the right as they saw it. In this time of peace, when swords are beaten into plowshares and spears into pruning hooks when the grass waves and the flowers bloom alike upon the graves of olden foes, what a meeting should this be of brave, generous and magnanimous men. Though once arrayed against each other—the one side filled with the consciousness of right, and the other wrong as proved by the arbitrament of arms, and the verdict of the following years, but equally brave, honest and sincere.

"As brave men they fought, as brave men they resignedly accepted the conditions, returned to their homes with but little effort save their manhood and the virtue of their women, to take up the work of the American citizen that adds to the common prosperity of the country. Had they not been brave foes the victory would not be worth the boasting; were the and you less brave and generous now, you were not worthy to be citizens of a great republic.

"Here is given strong rebuke to the narrow souls who would yet prate of discussions or sectional strife and hate. The lesson sent forth to the world from this battlefield will be that of forgiving, but not forgetting the great cause of strife. The American people, whether from the north or from the south, are brothers in sympathy and heart and purpose, marching steadily on, hand in hand, to achieve that grander destiny which awaits us as a nation in the future—as one people, of one country and under one flag."
