OBSERVATIONS.

It has always seemed strange that we should not speak to people, whom we meet every day, until the formality of an introduction has been gone through. We ride down town every morning, noon and evening in the same horse car with the same people; we pass and repass others at every turn every day of our lives until every lineament of their features are as familiar to us as our own, yet custom has fixed and made it a violation of decorum to bow to these people without an introduction. In Europe people invited together under the same roof meet on terms of equality, and recognizing this are privileged to address each other without the formality of an introduction, but in America, if in the course of an evening you find yourself beside one who is perfectly well known to you, but to whom you have not been presented, and venture some remark you are either repaid by a blank stare, a look of amazement, or a cool rejoinder that freezes the very springs of your vitality. You feel that you have made an ass of yourself and are sure that the one you have addressed, is in the wrath of her bosom, dubbing you impudent, forward and utterly unfit for society. The rules of society are as well founded as walls of solid masonry, against which to hurl one's self is to suffer the effects of the contact, but I put the question—and in setting it forth I hear its echo in thousands of others of the same thinking—does not this rule of waiting for introductions often seem an utter absurdity. In general the rule is a good and necessary one, but when the families of each are known to the other, where equality is felt, thorough respectability is known and there exists a desire in the heart of each to know the other, why not set our feet on the neck of conventionality and know whom it is pleasant and profitable to include among our acquaintances?

Now lest the public may think I am in love with some divinity whom I meet daily, or that I am craving the acquaintance of some one, I will say that you are wholly wrong as I am one of those peculiar souls to which a few friends is all sufficient, in the possession of which I am singularly fortunate. It is with pleasure and humility that I say it. To me the bestowal of great gifts has the same effect as unmerited praise—rebuke and humility.

I have come to the conclusion that apologies are useless. There is a world of truth in the old saying "that the least said is the easiest mend." It is well to excuse one's self if you have unintentionally given offense, but do so immediately with the same quick impulse that produced the offense. To wait a few days and go to the offended with a formal apology is to subject one's self to a state of humility, which after the apology is given will leave almost a feeling of anger toward the one to whom the apology has been given. It is a task to apologize, to say the right thing with proper dignity and after a formal apology there nearly always exists a feeling of constraint that months cannot overcome. He who demands an apology, unless the offense is a great one—and in that case apologies are worthless—puts himself on stilts and to bow to his shrine is more than should be asked of human nature. The best way to overcome an offense is to let matters drift, maintaining always a pleasant demeanor toward the offended and time will soon heal the sore places. Offenses are seldom given without regret and if an inclination afterward shown to continue the acquaintance, that should be sufficient evidence that the offense was unintentional and should answer for an apology.

Madam De Stael said there were but two distinct classes of human beings born—those with and those without enthusiasm. The former class were largely represented at the ball game on Friday. With Conley at the bat, the score six to four, the ninth inning and the splendid audience in a quiver of expectancy, the ball came squarely at the bat and brawny muscle sent it spinning toward the fence and as it cleared it beautifully and a home run was assured there went up a volume of enthusiasm that had never been equalled here; hats were hurled into the air, placed on canes and twirled frantically; ladies waved their handkerchiefs clapped their hands and men and women rose from their seats; outside of the amphitheatre men jumped up and down, hugged each other and pounded their legs; a continuous roar of voices testing the full capacity of lungs swelled from a thousand throats and as Conley's foot touched the home plate a shower of dollars, fifty cents and quarters greeted him. Yet we are called cold!

THE LITERARY CLUB.

A supplement, or feeder, or in some cases a substitute, is the literary club, which, in the main not pursuing a course so systematic and possibly so elementary, carries order and sequence through its yearly work. This club system abounds. There is hardly a village of considerable size that has not its club of this kind. The membership is mostly among women. You will find ten of these clubs made up of women to one made up of men. Observing foreigners say that our women are superior to the men. There appears reason for it. What proportions of women and men make up the membership of these summer schools we have not seen stated, but certainly the women are greatly in the majority in literary club work; and this kind of work tells rapidly. The superiority of the women over the men in culture—intellectual culture—is apparent in almost any social assembly. That is to say a superiority in numbers. You will find more women upon whom the influence of some intellectual culture is apparent than upon men. The summer school and the winter club are the great agencies in the work.—Indianapolis News.
