"A TOWER OF STRENGTH."

(From The Washington Herald, Tuesday, September 21, 1920.)

Proof is piling up every day of the campaign that the republicans of Indiana builded most wisely and well when they chose, by an astonishing vote of confidence in him, Warren T. McCray of Kentland to lead the republican state ticket as the candidate for governor. As the republicans come to know more of him their satisfaction with the outcome of the May primaries enlarges. McCray grows with closer acquaintance, and that is a great compliment to a public man. Long before his nomination, The Herald called attention to a phase of his character that showed the fidelity of the man. When he was defeated in 1916 for the nomination, there was not a single note of complaint, not a word of disappointment. He took off his coat, and went to work for the ticket with hands, head and purse. Right then he endeared himself to the republicans of Indiana and laid the sure foundations for his success in 1920. The people like a good loser, but a man has to be made of the right sort to stuff to be a good loser.

"I have no hobbies and no fads to try out."

The sentence we have quoted is Warren McCray's brief, expressive and illuminating campaign platform. More could not be said in a column. The declaration is typical of the man himself. When it is said of Warren McCray that he is a plain man of the people, the truth is spoken, the whole truth and nothing but the truth. He is an Indian without guile, a successful man, quiet, confident, self-contained. What he says he knows, and means. He understands the people of his state because he is one of them, an important unit in the economic and industrial life of the state. He is a farmer, and best is known as such, perhaps, but his activities and interests are general. He will take to the office of governor the qualities which make for administration success in every way—the attributes of common sense combined with knowledge and information.

It is predicted that Warren McCray will lead the Indiana vote when the returns are compiled in November. Maybe he will. The contrast between him and his democratic opponent is marked. It is the case of a practical business man who comprehends the needs of the state against a constricted professional whose knowledge of the people of Indiana is confined to a narrow circle of acquaintances in the city of Indianapolis.

What's become of the old time country woman that used to bring a big crock full of yellow butter to town? Life is too short to listen to a manuscript speech.
