THE WRECK OF LOVE.

BY THE BOSTON BARD.

Love's barque was launched on rapture's tide,
In beauty's sunniest day—
And fear-ful on in conscious pride,
She ploughed her joyous way—
The breeze of her bliss snowy sails
All soft and silent swelled,
O'er dimpled seas with gentlest gales,
Her careless course she held.
Joy seized the helm—his wild commands
The pilot, Pleasure, gave
The barque to steer to fairy lands,
Where wisdom's folly's slave,
And o'er this glassy surface now
With heedless haste she flows.
While hope sits smiling on the prow,
At hood-winked wisdom's eyes.
But bark! along the deep has sped
The hallow'd dirge of woe—
Joy drops the helm—and hope has fled,
Pale pleasure shrinks below.
Where art thou love?—The billows roar
About thy vessel's deck—
Love wake upon distraction's shore—
Shame's vortex gulfs the wreck.

From the New York Spectator.

"GOING IN THE COUNTRY."

"My dear," said Mrs. Artful to her loving spouse one day, as he came in fatigued from business to dinner—"My dear," said she, with sweeter smile than she had cast upon him for a twelve month—"Don't you think my complexion looks rather bilious for a few weeks past?"

"Why no, my dear," said the husband fondly patting her under the chin, and little dreaming to what this sudden gush of affection was to lead—"no my dear," said he, pressing her fondly to his bosom and implanting a fervent kiss upon her lips—"I have rarely known you look so well in the summer for many years. You don't feel ill my dear, I hope, to day? The weather has been so delightfully cool for the last month, and the atmosphere so bracing and elastic."

"Not exactly sic," said Mrs. Artful, before her husband had time to finish his commendations of the weather—"but then you know my dear," (not regarding what he was saying)—"that it is so unhealthy and disagreeable to spend the whole summer in the city. And so I've been thinking whether we could not take a trip to the springs, or to Niagara, just to get a little fresh air. Besides, Mrs. Flyabout has just dropped in, and she is going to make up a fine party. Mrs. Silverheels and her two sisters, and the daughter who married Mr. Shortstaple at the south, are to be of the company, and they have invited us to go along."

"Why, my dear," said Mr. A. "you must be aware that the times are hard. You know I endorsed for old Souchong, his brother-in-law Dashall, and his hopeful son-in-law Bob Tandem, and have had it all to pay. And beside, the apostle himself was not more encumbered with his bonds, than I am with the 'Life and Fire.' S'death! I might as well have died and been burnt up at once myself!"

"But my dear," rejoined the wife, "your business is good—your last cargoes sold well—you sold out your stocks before the troubles came on, and you are getting over your losses; and then the children—Emily and Catherine, and Frederick and George,—dear little souls!—have not been well these three weeks. They should be taken to the country. We can have them with their uncle Hardenbrook, at Sangesies where they can breathe and frolic in the fresh air. It will be so delightful!"

"My dear," said the husband earnestly "we cannot afford it. The children would be well enough if they were not indulged in every thing they cry for, and stuffed with poison in the shape of green fruit and green corn. It is true I have thus far been able to meet my notes; but I have had to shift and turn every way, and have already shinned it so much that I am ashamed to be seen in Wall-street. And then there are the bills for schooling, and the music bills, and the French teacher, and the dancing master—the convex mirrors for the parlour, and the ninety dollars you know, for your last cashmere shawl—all, all, must be paid next week. Indeed, I hardly know!"

"Oh, you are always pleading poverty, whenever I want to be gratified with a jaunt into the country for a few days. There's Mrs. Gossamer, and Mrs. Fandable, and Mrs. Yardstick, have all been taking their pleasure in the country these three weeks—and heream I so oppressed for breath—and the dear little ones too—and nothing but Manhattan water, as salt as Lot's wife!"

"But do hear to reason, wife. If Gossamer would pay for the last dozen cases of silks which he bought of me—or if Fandable would charge me three percent, a month for money to pay other people's debts—or if my business was all profit and no risk, like a draper's—then I would think of it. At present, however, I do not think it would be exactly honest to!"

"Honest! Why, Mr. Artful, need you be more honest than your neighbors? Half of our acquaintance have failed since the last year; and most of them are now travelling to Katskill and Lake George, and Lebanon, as though nothing had happened. I don't see for my part, why you should slave yourself to death, and keep me and the children shut up in the city all the summer long, when it is as hot as an oven."

"But I say again wife—I cannot afford it. If we go, I must borrow the money from old Gripus—and then if those bills should be returned from England with a protest at their tails, we shall be!"

"Then you'll be as well off as your neighbors," replied the lady, with much less sweetness of manner than she commenced this dialogue. "Besides, to be plain about the matter, I have promised to go, and have this morning purchased travelling dresses for the children, which Mrs. Gimp and the two Misses Buckrams have engaged to have all finished before the boat goes to-morrow evening. So, you see go we must, or I shall be disgraced, and!"

"That matter can be easily settled. Give the clothes to the makers for their pay it would be infinitely more to my advantage. It would be far better to suffer that loss, than to expend half a fortune for the sake of using them. And perhaps it would be more judicious the next time, before you make purchases, to ascertain in the first place how they are to be paid for. And then, as for the 'disgrace,' which will be the most disgraceful, to stay at home, and by industry and economy strive to retrieve our losses, or dash about among the fashionables this month, for the pleasure of gazing at our friends through iron casements the next?"

Mrs. A. (weeping) "Tis too bad, I protest, that I have heard of nothing from you but losses and poverty ever since we were married. I am heartily sick of it, and our poor children will never be able to hold up their heads in genteel company—they will always feel mean and poverty struck. They are so much in the habit of believing that you are not worth sixpence, that I really pity them; and if we must all be so miserably off through life, I wish they'd never been born."

It was utterly in vain for poor Mr. Artful to attempt any further resistance. His wife was bent on going, and he finally saw that sooner or later he should be compelled to surrender either to her tongue or her tears. With a deep drawn sigh, therefore, and heartily wishing the Gossamers and Flyabouts in the depth of the sea, he at length ceased to oppose, and finally yielded a reluctant consent.

TOM COOK.

Tom Cook at the age of seventy was committed to goal in Middlesex, for theft. The clergyman of the town thought it his duty to pay him a visit. After some introductory conversation he expressed to Cook a desire to converse with him relative to his course of life. Cook affirmed that he was a much better man than he was taken for. "Tis true," said he, "that I have often taken the property of others but I have exercised much prudence and philanthropy in my calling and the poor man was never the worse for any deed of mine. I have charitable feelings, and delight to relieve misery. Do you not think I should take pleasure in saving a drowning man?" "Perhaps you would," said the clergyman, "but would his pocket book be safe?" "Oh, yes sir, I always took special care of such things." The parson endeavoured to look serious and proceeded—"You are an old man Mr. Cook, and it is truly a melancholy thing to see you again confined as a thief. Probably you have so long indulged in crime, that it would be useless to talk to you of religion or morality, but I will appeal to you on the ground of interest. You have not been diligent in your occupation, and have endured its hardships to an advanced age; but you are still without property and your miseries seem likely to continue. Would it not be better to try some new mode of life, that you have the means of support in your old age, and exchange the solitude and labors of a prison, for some comfortable employment."

Cook listened with great attention and respect. "Sir," said he "I have been long thinking of what you propose. Your views are just, and I feel gratified that we feel so much alike. Indeed I have long felt the folly of my conduct; I have grown wise by experience, and hope to make some amends to society by my advice to the young. I am fully satisfied that most men of my profession, like myself, have been ruined by commencing business without capital.—We have been obliged to make such quick sales, that the sacrifice has been immense and ruinous; and I wish every man to be advised and warned, by one who is about to leave them forever, never to enter on the profession, unless he can command a capital that will allow him to keep stolen goods on hand till he can sell to the owner without being suspected."

The plain of Jericho.—The traveller Jerocin, in going from the Dead Sea to Jerusalem, took Jericho in his way. With respect to the apple of Sodom, whose outward form and beautiful appearance allures the eye, & deceives him who thinks to enjoy it, containing within nothing but a light dusty substance, he believes that Halbequist has erroneously taken it for the fruit of the Solanum Melongena, which our traveller found nowhere near Jericho, but only the Solanum Sanctum. He himself conceives the apple of Sodom to be nothing less than the bladder-formed-gall-nut, which is raised by the stings of insects upon the Pistotia Terebinthus. He remarked that no where had Flora undergone greater changes than in the Plain of Jericho. The valuable shrub which gave the balsam, had disappeared; of the celebrated rose of Jericho, no vestige is left; of the numberless palm-trees, on account of which Jericho was called the City of Palms, there remained only a single representative: in vain should one look for that fig tree which St. Luke speaks. The whole broad plain is now a naked desert waste, which stretches from the mountain of Judah to the banks of the Jordan. [Nux. Gior de Litterati.

Remedy for the Effects of Dram Drinking.—Whoever makes the attempt to abandon spirit drinking will find from time to time a rankling in the stomach, with a sensation of sinking, coldness and inexpressible anxiety. This may be relieved by taking often a cupful of an infusion of cloves, made by steeping about an ounce of them in a pint of boiling water for six hours, and then straining off the liquor. In a state of torment, languor and debility, an ounce and a half of the cascarrilla bark, (being also first bruised in a mortar,) should be added to the infusion. This mixture taken in the quantity above specified, three times a day, will be found a useful strengthener of the stomach and bowels, when they have been disordered by frequent excess and intoxication.

The marriage of a Mr. Williams, aged nearly 50, to Miss. Candle, aged 14, has given rise to much badinage in the various prints in the Union. The humorous lines below were first published in the Berkshire American:

What e'er is odd on Hymen's state,
The ways in rhyme will twist it,
Whether in courtship, name, or age,
The married ones have missed it.
But e'en though willings make a rout,
And whims severely handle,
When life's poor lamp is going out,
'Tis wise to get a Candle.
