spectacular film production called "Dangerous Days," which comes to the Alhambra for the last half of the week, beginning Thursday.

It deals with the activities of the "reds" in this country. The hero is a young chap, who longs to uplift the laboring classes and because of his blind enthusiasm, falls prey to a band of agitators who use him to further their nefarious schemes.

Confessions of a Bride

That "spirit controls" had their own little pet fads was news to Miss Miller and to me. We sought light on such a vital subject and Chrys obligingly explained:

"Why, some of my controls seem to have an artistic temperament. They are sensitive and retire unless they are questioned in a low voice, almost in a whisper, and they reply only on an instrument of the most delicate mechanism. You remember, Jane, my lovely board of polished sandal wood with the ivory pointer? I know a poet—I mean the spirit of a poet—who never comes unless I take up that board? Others are much less particular."

"Maybe ghosts have moods," I suggested. Chrys nodded her agreement, and then addressed our hostess:

"Of course I'll send you a board tonight, Katherine, but please do not start to use it as a joke. It will not let you consider it merely fit to furnish an evening's fun."

"Indeed it will not," said I to myself. "You'll hypnotize yourself with it—you'll make it say what you want it to say, and then you'll believe that the spirits are talking to you. Thus you will trip yourself!"

With that thought I sat up as straight as a poker. It was a flash of intuition—an idea of my own—and so new—and so true—that I was startled. I put the idea into form thus:

"On the ouija board you will reveal to others your own secret thoughts—if you don't watch out!"

I decided at once that I would "watch out" if Chrys and Katherine and all the enthusiasts, who manipulate the little wheeled pointer, were doomed to betray to an intelligent observer their secret longings.

The test couldn't fail if the men who know most about the workings of the human brain are right. They say that the brain often acts unconsciously, and that what is spelled out on the ouija board is exactly what the persons whose fingers rest upon the plane wishes to believe, although he may not know.

"If that is so, I've discovered a perfectly grand way to do a little mind reading," thought I. "And if Katherine Miller embodies my 'sinister destiny' I can thwart her, because I can discover what is in her mind by what she spells out on the board. Now isn't that a wonderful brand-new way of keeping tabs on

Asks Parking Space for Baby Carriages

CLEVELAND, O., March 24.—Babies are just as important as automobiles, Councilman Sulzmann, father of fourteen children, announced, and he is preparing an ordinance providing parking space for baby carriages in the downtown district.

the movements of your enemy? What a grand idea for detectives, too!" Chrys had many remarkable experiences with the ouija board to relate to Katherine, but the climax of them all was the startling statement supposed to have been made about Daddy Lorimer by the ouija who had been drowned in the storm.

As this story progressed, Katherine forgot that she had a very bad ankle. When she heard that Don Manuel was with Certeide on the ship which had picked up Daddy, she turned a vivid scarlet. I had never seen the girl blush. I think her confusion made her most unhappy, for she arose from her bed and, without a thought to her lame ankle, she walked across the room to a chair.

"Her lameness had been a pretense! Pretenses seem to make up that girl's life. She deceives people for no reason at all but plain perversity," thought I.

Her blush at the mention of Don Manuel's name was certainly genuine and it explained her enthusiasm about Chrys' plan to buy a nice little ship for a voyage up and down the Pacific in search of her father.

"It would be so sweet of you to come along, Katherine," was Chrys' invitation. "What a grand substitute for Palm Beach!" exclaimed Katherine.

"Oh, in a! The shortest road to Don Manuel!" said I to myself. "I hope she goes. Even if she is mad about that Spaniard, her love wouldn't keep her from interfering in my affairs, just for the sake of hurting me." Copyright, 1920.
