

PRESIDENT OF FRANCE MUST POSSESS WIFE

Tradition Bars a Bachelor From Highest Honor in Gift of Republic.

NEW LEADER PRAISED

PARIS, April 9.—French tradition decrees that the chief of the republic must have a wife.

That is why the doors of the Elysee are resolutely shut to bachelors and widowers.

Counting Mme. Deschanel, there have been ten lady presidents, as unlike one another as each president differed from his predecessor.

The public voice, always very loud and sharp in France, accords to Mme. Thiers, the first in date, the reputation of private economy carried to the point of public measures.

Mme. MacMahon, a grande dame, was her husband's veritable counsellor.

Her charity was proverbial. She even installed a workshop in the palace, where she and her friends made pretty clothes for the poor.

During the sojourn of Mme. Grevy at the Elysee there were no sumptuous fetes, no gala dinners.

She was a very simple woman, minutely observing the rules of neutrality, and in a narrow way, very good and devoted.

MME. CARNOT OF OPPOSITE TYPE.

Mme. Carnot, her successor, delighted in luxurious displays most tastefully carried out, in flashing contrast to the "strictly necessary" motto of Mme. Grevy.

Her idea was that the emoluments of the presidency ought to be given back to France, so she kept open house, and her gracious personality did much to counteract the impression of austerity which her husband gave.

Mme. Casimir-Perier was a short and tragic bird of passage.

She conceived gorgeous plans that events did not permit her to realize.

France long kept the souvenir of this woman as elegant as she was distinguished.

PLAYS RATHER EFFACED ROLE.

Mme. Felix Faure played a somewhat effaced role. The real lady president was Mlle. Lucie Felix-Faure, who admirably fulfilled the thousand and one obligations of an official life.

Mme. Loubet did not take the slightest interest in politics, and solely occupied herself with her family and household.

Mme. Fallieres liked to draw into the background and to go into society as little as possible.

She used to say she had a horror of being on show.

The grumblers at the third republic complained that the Palais was becoming middle-class.

Economy was no doubt a great national virtue but they would not have minded seeing the salary of the president spent in a larger public measure.

MME. POINCARÉ IDEAL LEADER.

Then came Mme. Poincaré, and the Palais woke up from its mild torpor.

The chief lady of France mixed intimately in the literary, artistic and social world.

She was the constant companion of the president, and identified herself with all the joys and sorrows of her country.

From 1914 to 1920 Mme. Poincaré was to be found anywhere where there was suffering to be relieved.

To the wounded in the hospitals her passage had something of the charm and magic of our own Florence Nightingale in the Crimea.

Mme. Deschanel needs no praise.

Her evenings at the Palais-Bourbon already have equalled in splendor and in distinction those of the Elysee.

'Second Look' Gives $1,200 to Rancher

WHITEWOOD, S. D., April 8.—The taking of a second look at an old alfalfa haystack enabled Hans Carstensen, a rancher near here, to add $1,200 to his bank account.

A few days following the "second look" a thrashing outfit hove in sight and Carstensen decided to have the seed thrashed as "demonstration."

The stack yielded 3,200 pounds of seed, which Carstensen sold at 39 cents a pound

Mother, in School, Tries to Catch Up

PITTSBURGH, April 9.—Finding that her four children were forging ahead of both her and her husband, Mrs. J. W. Schad went to the Fifth avenue night school. She found time to take up English, French and German, which she now speaks and writes.

Mrs. Schad has one son in high school and three children in the lower grades. Asked what she intended to do if her children should advance further, she declared she would take a college course.
