"THIS IS THE YEAR"

LUKE DUFFEY finds others more appreciative of his public work than the Jewett machine that defeated him in his race for the republican nomination for congress.

AMONG OTHER THINGS, the republican state convention that endorsed the administration of Goodrich seems to have endorsed control of prosecutors by the governor, also.

IT IS A PECULIAR KIND of morals that makes it a disgrace to the city to have shrubbery stolen from a park and a distinction to have twelve automobiles stolen in one night.

BECAUSE OF THE NEWSPRINT STRINGENCY, the government printing office is refusing orders for extra copies of congressmen's speeches. That ought to be a potent argument in favor of immediate adjournment.

The Ramifications of Goodrichism

The people of Indiana have as yet little conception of the extent to which the centralization theories originated by James P. Goodrich and imposed on the state in 1916 have permeated the government of Indiana.

They have, of course, realized that in the fixing of taxes and in the control of bond issues, Goodrich has assumed absolute and dictatorial rights through the state tax board which he appoints.

They have also realized, to some extent, at least, that in the control of the state highway commission he has assumed the power to build highways where, when and of what material he pleases, regardless of their utility or the desires of the people.

Last winter they had a very good illustration of his ability to control the legislature when that body met, ratified suffrage for women and ran away leaving the state institutions in a desperate financial condition.

More recently they had an illustration of the tremendous power they have entrusted to one man when Goodrich was able to make James E. Watson bend his knee and go on record in the republican state convention as endorsing the administration of James P. Goodrich.

Today we have evidence that James P. Goodrich is exerting his personal influence in the matter of law enforcement—not to compel a vigorous campaign against wrongdoers, but to prevent men who violate the law from being prosecuted.

The evidence and the charge does not come from a democratic source. It is not made in the heat of a political campaign.

The assertion that prosecution of violators of the workmen's compensation act was stopped "apparently because of the fact that some of our governor's friends were implicated" is made by a republican office holder in a letter to a former republican office holder.

It appears to be the honest confession of a man who was regarded by a republican prosecutor as of sufficient judgment to be entrusted with prosecutions in the name of the state of Indiana.

No one is likely to dispute James L. Murray's explanation of the collapse of the proposed prosecutions of violators of the workmen's compensation act.

It is, of course, admitted that the industrial board is subservient to the governor. Were it not admitted, the fact that the board, more than a year ago, protected Goodrich by refusing to make public record relative to the garbage plant he and his associates unloaded on the taxpayers of Indianapolis would be interesting corroborative evidence.

Mr. Murray says the prosecutions were dependent on the board for their "support and aid and records" and the board "hesitated to advise or act contrary to the governor's will, especially since he has assumed direction over all departments of the state."

Here, then, is a case that ought to interest the people of Indiana—a case in which a prosecutor says he is unable to enforce the law because a governor of his own political faith does not want the law enforced.

Our Part in the World

It is indeed difficult for some of the prominent gentlemen in public life to reconcile their viewpoints of individual duty with their viewpoints of national duty.

William Jennings Bryan, for example, will hardly be heard to argue that it is not the duty of a good citizen of this country to participate in politics or in civic affairs having for their purpose the betterment of the community as a whole.

Yet, Mr. Bryan does not appear impressed with the argument that it is the duty of this nation to interest itself in world affairs with a view to making the world a better place for the existence of the nation.

In the family circle of the world the nation is the individual. No one nation may hold aloof from world affairs without shirking its duty to the family circle or, eventually, shirking its duty to the individuals who compose it.

For whether it wills so or not, sooner or later the individual nation is bound to be affected by the conduct of other nations in whom it may have little interest and for whom it can have no sympathy.

It should not be forgotten that the fire that threatened to consume the world was kindled on the boundary lines of two little nations whose relationship to the United States was so remote as to be almost indistinguishable.

So it will always be in this world, and with the advance of communicative agencies the remoteness will become less and less each year.

To argue, then, against participation in the world's affairs by the United States, is to argue against the generally accepted theory that good citizenship demands interest in the general welfare.

Mr. Bryan is opposed to the acceptance by the United States of a mandate over Armenia. His arguments fall before the one broad principle that the affairs of the world are the affairs of every nation in it.

There may be specific reasons why the United States should not concern itself in Armenian affairs, although none suggests itself at this time, but it will not do to refuse this mandate on the theory that the United States should not be concerned in the affairs of Europe.

It was not so when Perry sailed to Japan. It was not so when our sailors bombarded the ports of Tripoli. It was not so when we accepted a mandate over Cuba and the Philippine islands.

There was no suggestion of keeping aloof from world affairs when Roosevelt sent the grand fleet around the world to impress its peoples of the ability of America to take her full part in world government.

This nation can not, even if it desired, confine its influence to the western hemisphere.

The question that confronts us now is whether or not, being forced to become a world power, we will be a world power for good or merely in theory.

Just Prunes

The Air Nitrates corporation, which recently underwent one of the costly republican snooping committee's investigations is appealing to the public's sense of fair play in asking judgment on its building of the Muscle Shoals plant.

In the presentation of one of the subjects of controversy it says: "No person whose dislike for prunes unbalances his judgment should pass upon the work at Muscle Shoals."

Facetious as this may appear, it is really a sane statement in the midst of a mass of foolishness.

For in the report of the "investigator" sent to work by the republicans in the house for the purpose of discrediting the administration there is a paragraph devoted to the purchase of a carload of prunes, which purchase is set out as "just one instance of the reckless system of purchasing which was practiced at Muscle Shoals."

Frank S. Washburn, president of the Air Nitrates corporation, says:

"We do not know whether to take seriously the statement that a whole carload of prunes valued at $4,000 was purchased at one time. Perhaps it will be sufficient to point out that the population on the reservation at times numbered 25,000 and that this purchase by the commissary department provided an average of 16 cents worth of prunes to each person, which, to those who like prunes, will not seem excessive."

The Good Sport

If you are a good sport you will know it, no matter how lacking in conceit you are, for there is nothing, probably, that brings more spontaneous recognition and appreciation than this very quality.

If you are a good sport when you are traveling you will take the necessary discomforts of traveling without complaint, and do what you can to obviate the unnecessary discomforts, both for yourself and for your fellow travelers.

You won't complain unduly at the heat, but you will open the window, or in winter, ask the brakeman if he will be good enough to turn the steam off.

You won't fret at delays, but will instead try to pass the time as pleasantly as possible with a magazine or a newspaper, or perhaps in entertaining the child of some other traveler.

The good sport at a restaurant gets better service than the bad sport—everybody knows that.

The good sport at home remembers it is just as much worth while to be a good sport at breakfast, in the intimacy of the family, as it is to be a good sport in the face of a catastrophe.

The good sport in business works with a will and is not constantly criticizing the work of those about him.

The good sport is the best friend in the world and, all in all, the most refreshing and delightful person to be with.—Copyright, 1920.

Ask Heavy Damages Following Accident

Damages of $10,000 are asked in a suit filed in the circuit court by One B. Reames, administratrix of the estate of Forest Reiber, against the Terre Haute, Indianapolis and Eastern Traction Com-
