

THREAD SHORTAGE IS DUE TO WOMEN

Dealer Says Many Buy More Than They Require.

"I want a box of white thread No. 55," ordered the late customer at the notion counter.

"We can't sell you one spool," returned the tired saleswoman.

"And why not," demanded the lady, "because we haven't got it and can't get it?"

"Some store," and the late customer swept out of the store with her head elevated to a dangerous altitude.

"Now that's just the reason we can't keep thread in stock," observed the sales buyer.

"Just as soon as a woman hears there is a shortage on the article she makes a tour of the department stores and buys up every spool of thread in the house and stocks up for the next ten years."

HAVE WHAT THEY DON'T NEED.

"There are hundreds of women in this city if we could only learn the actual truth, who have from three to ten spools of thread which they do not need."

"If the public could only see that they make the shortage themselves—and not do this—we could tide them over."

There has been and still is undoubtedly a shortage of thread in the United States.

A South Meridian street wholesale house receives fifty dozen spools a day instead of the customary 50,000.

The heavy shortage has been on white cotton in the numbers ranging from 30 to 70.

These are the numbers where the demand is the greatest, although not such a noticeable shortage runs through all numbers of cotton thread both white and black.

The primary trouble begins with the production in the fields.

IMPOSSIBLE TO GET LABOR.

Draft for service and war occupations made it impossible to procure sufficient laborers to raise the cotton.

Likewise, the mills have been given over to war products until recently, and even now it is impossible to employ help enough to make a normal output.

The recent factory strikes and the railroad tieups also have helped to complicate the situation.

In addition the new spools are being made to hold 150 and 250 yards of thread. Confusion in the local stores because of the respective increase in prices further has tangled up the matter.

Merchants advise that if women do not wish to cause a vacancy instead of a

PUSS IN BOOTS JR.

By DAVID CORY.

You remember in the last story that as soon as the little goat bleated, the table disappeared with all the good things to eat. And then Puss said to the little girl:

"I wish I had a little goat like yours. He'd make a fine companion to me on my travels."

"I couldn't part with him," said the little girl, whose name was Two-eyes, "for without him I should have only crusts to eat."

"Oh, are you the Two-eyes in the Fairy Story Book?" asked Puss, and he curled his whiskers and smiled at her. And after that he went home with her and the little goat, and when they were quite near the house, she said:

"I fear my mother and sisters will treat you ill if you come into the house." So Puss said he'd sleep in the stable with the little goat.

Early in the morning Puss was awakened by a noise and, peeping out of the stable, all overstocking and hoarding of thread he put to an end; that they buy only what is necessary and no more.

If such rules were followed stringently the market would move more freely, while the mills gradually would get back to the normal output.

stable, he saw one of the cruel sisters bending over the poor little goat, whom she had just killed to spite Two-eyes! And then, all of a sudden, a wonderful tree sprang up from the spot where the poor little goat's blood had been spilled. Its leaves were silver, and the fruit gold, and the morning wind made it sing like a harp.

And after that a handsome prince rode up on horseback and the three cruel sisters, on seeing him, pushed poor little Two-eyes under a barrel, which they were about to fill with the golden apples.

But the noble prince didn't see this, for he was still too far away. And when he rode up he asked for some of the golden fruit. But, oh dear me! When those cruel sisters tried to pick the golden apples the boughs of the wonderful tree sprang away from their hands and they couldn't touch the fruit.

"Now's the time for me to do something," thought Puss, and he ran out of the stable and said: "Noble Prince, the fairest of the four sisters is hidden in this barrel. 'Tis she who owns this wonderful tree and only she can pluck the fruit."

And as soon as he heard that, the noble Prince sprang from his horse and lifted up the barrel, and there sat little Two-eyes with her lap full of golden apples.

"Take her away with you," whispered Puss, "for she is most cruelly treated by her family." And then the Prince lifted her up on his saddle, and after that he took Puss in his arms and sprang up beside her and away they went on his fast horse to his stately castle in the green woods far away.

Over the meadows and over the sea, The noble Prince is riding so free, And little Puss Junior safe at his side.

Italian Bee Being Grown Over State

The hybrid and black bee is rapidly being replaced in Indiana by the Italian bee, and there is a falling off of 8 per cent in European foulbrood this year compared to last year among colonies of members in the State Beekeepers' association, according to C. O. Yost, apilary inspector for the state conservation department.

This marked improvement in scientific bee culture is largely due, Mr. Yost said, to the co-operation of the affiliated county associations.

According to Mr. Yost's report the inspection force under supervision of Frank N. Wallace, state entomologist, is now closing a most successful season.

So well organized were the special tours of inspection conducted this year that three inspectors visited 296 apiaries, inspected 5,822 colonies of bees and held more than two hundred demonstrations during the month of June.

The June record is one thousand colonies greater than has ever been before. Last year four men inspected 4,500 colonies in June.
