

EFFORT TO SAVE GASOLINE SUPPLYExpert Would Change Motors to Lower Horse Power.

NEW YORK, Aug. 4.—Changes in engine construction with the idea of obtaining more miles per gallon of gasoline are advocated by R. L. Welch, secretary and general counsel of the American Petroleum Institute, in a memorandum addressed to the members of the Society of Automobile Engineers, setting forth the seriousness of the gasoline situation.

As another means of conserving the gasoline supplies supply of gasoline, Mr. Welch suggests that the horsepower of heavy cars be cut down.

Mr. Welch believes that the remedy for the present fuel shortage lies in the following steps:

"First, the government of the United States must co-operate with the oil business and with the automotive industry at home and abroad."

"Second, the greatest possible efficiency must be obtained by the automotive industry and by the consumer from motor fuel."

"Third, the oil industry must be more efficient and must get more gasoline from each barrel of crude."

MAILS STATEMENT TO 5,000 ENGINEERS.

The statement, which has been mailed to more than 5,000 automotive engineers, reads in part as follows:

"The automobile industry and the public have been asking for years what kind of gasoline or motor fuel we were going to have in the future and whether it would be necessary to abandon gasoline as motor gasoline today."

"The time has arrived when, so far as ordinary foresight can see, we can answer the first question by stating that the motor fuel of the future probably will be substantially the same product as motor gasoline today."

"But it seems equally clear that there will not be enough of it to go around unless the automotive engineers co-operate to find a solution."

"The time has now come when, from the oil man's standpoint, it would seem as though the problem of the automotive engineer is to build engines that, instead of making from seven to twelve miles, a gallon of gasoline will make twenty or thirty miles on the same amount."

"The problem is not to build engines to burn refined oil, but some product of petroleum other than the present motor fuel."

"At the present time there is not enough petroleum to meet all requirements."

"With the speed limit of automobiles fixed at about twenty-five miles an hour, burial and with the crowded condition of our city streets and roads today, making it unsafe to drive very much faster, why is it not advisable and practicable to cut down materially the consumption of gasoline by all types of automobiles by the more efficient use of fuel?

"Should not the horsepower of the heavy cars be cut down, and could not the cheaper and lighter cars be so equipped as to get all the speed desirable from a very much smaller amount of gasoline than is now used?"

"There is need to curb the present demand for motor cars with motors developing 70 to 80 horsepower which are operated generally at twenty miles an hour."

"The logic of the situation is such that automotive engineers should plan to use and conserve the present-day motor fuel."

"The only fuels possibly available aside from the present-day motor fuels are kerosene and perhaps a distillate similar to the fuel which is used in Diesel engines, that is, something approaching gas oil."

"The price of kerosene and gas oil is rising more rapidly than the price of gasoline."

"With the great demand for these two products, it is difficult to see where the kerosene is going to come from to enhance the motor fuel supply."

WHEN A GIRL MARRIES
A New Serial of Young Married Life

By ANN LISLE

CHAPTER CV.

Evvy smiled, put down her cup and took one elaborately causal nibble at a sandwich. Then she pushed her plate aside and leaned across the table—still smiling.

"My dear, must I remind you? You know I was a very convenient friend for you to have not so long ago—when you didn't want Mrs. Varden to suspect anything about that dangerous robe my cousin Tom gave you."

There was an unmasked threat in every word. Evvy had helped me. Now she was ready to collect—and to collect in full.

She read my silence to suit herself.

"Ah—I see we do understand each other now. I don't want to be made a fool of—used and dropped by you and your brother Neal, and you don't want the world to know how useful my cousin Tom has been to you."

"Stop! Stop right this instant!" I cried firmly—determined she should understand that I rejected her ugly bargain, and rejected it completely. "You know as well as I do that there can be any ugly discussions about the robe, since your cousin Neal left it in his apartment along with the rest of the furnishings. Jim looks upon that robe exactly as he does the carved chest in which it was stored. So we won't discuss this again, please. And if you want Mrs. Varden to know that you fibbed to her—just tell her. That won't reflect on me either."

Like every bully in the world, Evvy changed her tone the minute she found her bluff was going to be met—and called.

"My dear! Don't get so excited—perhaps I'm a little hurt about the way Neal neglects me for that silly little Phoebe, and I thought you might have the same instinctive desire to tell me that I feel for you when you bumped into Mrs. Varden that day. But don't act as if you thought I was threatening you! Are you going to humiliate me, too?"

I was wearied by the whole discussion. I nodded to the waiter and took the check. In spite of Evvy's protests that she had invited me. I wanted to burst out and ask her when she could possibly want of Neal. Evvy was at least my own age—twenty-six—of that I felt sure, and my twenty-two-year-old brother was really only a child; yet she spoke of him with actual passion. Was that hurt pride—or some even greater urge that moved her?
