VOTE for Davis for Decency.

MUST PERSHING go back to France to say, "Lafayette, we are here, but we have quit?"

WHO nominated Ora Davies, the treasurer who went short in Howard County, the Republicans of Indiana or the Severin bosses?

THE SAME SPIRIT that locked the voting machine at the League of Nations headquarters insists that you must approve of the Goodrich administration.

WILL YOU PAY more taxes under a Republican administration or will you elect a Democrat to the prosecutor's office who will stop the waste of public money?

The Tickets Compared

It may be possible for the blind partisans of Indiana to reconcile their votes with their consciences and support the Republican ticket purely on party grounds, but it is hardly likely that the women voters, who cast their first votes this year, will overlook character in determining their choice.

For Senator, the Republicans nominated James Eli Watson, a professional office seeker whom the whole country once condemned for his unsavory connection with Colonel Mulhall, a confessed lobbyist of the most insidious type. He is opposed by Thomas Taggart, a friend of Indiana people whose reputation has remained unsullied throughout twenty years of bitter political warfare.

For Governor, the Republicans nominated Warren T. McCray, a Chicago Board of Trade operator, whose claims to be a farmer utterly collapsed and whose business record has disclosed him as a betrayer of his associates and a willing user of methods the Supreme Court of Indiana pronounces "unconscionable." He is opposed by Dr. Carleton B. McCulloch, who won his cross in unselfish devotion to the American wounded in the trenches of France.

For Treasurer, the Republicans nominated Ora Davies, a man who was short in his accounts as Howard County treasurer and "covered" the shortage by collusion with a State examiner whose duty it was to expose him. He is opposed by George De Hority, a young man with a clean record of commercial fidelity acquired in reputable banking circles.

In Marion County the story is the same. Merrill Moores, doddering about Washington, where he has a record of nothing except partisan regularity, was renominated for Representative and came back to Indianapolis, where he had to be introduced to Senator Harding, his party's nominee for President. He is opposed by Henry Spaan, a clear-sighted, powerful speaking lawyer with vision to grasp big problems and the energy to make himself known in the capital.

For prosecutor, the Republicans nominated William P. Evans, turning down William E. Reilly, a man of ability and courage. Evans is the willing deputy of the spineless Claris Adams, the friend of Pop Leppert, bootlegger, and the prosecutor who sat slyly by and watched the county jail transformed into a gambling house and a torture chamber. Evans is today the choice of all the gamblers, election crooks and bootlegging parasites who ply their nefarious trades at the expense of decency in Indianapolis. Opposing him is Paul G. Davis, clean to the core, enthusiastic, capable, more feared by the underworld than any candidate on either ticket and anxiously awaiting an opportunity to stand between the public treasury and the terrific drains upon it that have doubled taxation in the county.

There is no choice between these men that can be reconciled with duty to the community.

Tuesday, the voters must rebuke the bossism that gave the Republican party its ticket of misfits or admit their inability to place in office men capable of filling those offices.

The True Hoosier

On Indiana voters Nov. 2 will devolve the duty of conferring a justly earned and unselfishly sought honor on a man who, for more than forty years, has been a Hoosier in all that the name implies.

Eliminating entirely the political aspect of this campaign for the honor of representing Indiana in the Senate there are two reasons why Thomas Taggart should be elected.

The first reason is that he is more nearly representative of the heart and character of the people of Indiana than any man today in public life. The second is that as a Senator he will be most free to serve the people of this State, for whom he has always shown a supreme willingness to sacrifice himself and all he has.

Mr. Taggart is a reflection of Hoosier character, inherent ability and the kindliest spirit that has ever moved man. From obscurity and poverty he rose to prominence and affluence without leaving behind him a wake of broken or injured stepping stones.

Men on whom he leaned in early years came to lean on him and they never found him faltering.

Throughout the whole of his career he has steadily exercised a wonderful faculty for serving others until today the recipients of his courtesies and his favors in Indiana form a host that makes of him its political idol.

Last night, in the closing address of his campaign, he said there was no one for whom he would not rather do a favor than an injury. It has ever been thus in his life and that characteristic has made him the most popular man in Indiana.

In his character, his private life, Mr. Taggart reflects the true Hoosier type and that in itself ought to be sufficient to bring to him the support of all who love the State of Indiana.

In the United States Senate Mr. Taggart will have the opportunity to apply a proved business ability to national affairs as they pertain to Indiana. His official actions will never be influenced by the effect they may have on Thomas Taggart, for there exists no desire for further political honors, no need of commercial gain, and no possibility of pressure from selfish interests.

Senator Taggart, in Washington, will be free to act in accordance with his keen perception in the interests of the people of Indiana whom he represents.

He does not have to be elected to the United States Senate to stand head and shoulders above any aspirant for office as a true Hoosier gentleman, the friend of all Indians, severally and collectively.

And for the very reason that his life is dedicated to the helping of his fellow men, his opportunity to do the most good for them should be insured Nov. 2.

Concerning Senator Harding

Who delves into the records and lives of political candidates must expect no thanks for the performance of a public duty when the results of his investigation reach the partisan blinded followers of the candidate. Most of us would rather believe good than evil of our fellow citizens and to the thoughtless the conferring of a nomination puts a seal of approval on the character of a nominee.

In days before primaries were consistently corrupted and personal acquaintance with candidates was general this may have been possible, but more recently, when thousands of voters must gain their conception of political aspirants solely through the avenues of publications which are often swayed by partisan leanings, when possession of the organization almost always means nomination, the stamp of a primary preference means little as to character.

In this campaign the Republican party nominated Senator Harding of Ohio, the least preferred of all the Republican candidates for President who sought Indiana's support.

His character, antecedents and private life were little known to Indians. They were not exploited in the primaries and it is only in the last few weeks that the voters of this State have had any facts on which to base a conclusion as to the nominee's personal fitness to hold the highest office in the United States.

Failure on the part of the Republican campaign managers properly to acquaint the voters with Senator Harding is today more responsible for rumors concerning him than any other one thing. Where authentic information is lacking, unauthentic holds full sway and voters cannot be censured if, in the absence of better information, they accept as true that which is easily available.

WHEN A GIRL MARRIES

A New Serial of Young Married Life

By Ann Lisle

"Dear Donna Anne, in another moment you'll make me think I'm not welcome," said he, chuckling. "I storned to my feet and confronted him in wild fury."

"I tried to laugh this off—to avoid melodrama," I cried. "But you insist on a scene. All right—let's have it! What are you doing in my apartment? I demand to know. My husband!"

"Oh, yes—your husband!" he smiled wisely. "I was downstairs when the operator called the Canteen and reported that it didn't answer. I had supper with 'Pat tonight. Dined not wisely but too well. Put told me you were working at the Canteen. Where friend Carliott works. When friend husband calls a number of his own and then hurries out a little while after he can't get the Canteen I put two and two together. And I came up to keep you from getting lonesome or being afraid. Now, aren't you ashamed of your ingratitude?"

"You've been drinking!" I cried. "So I don't suppose you realize how disgusting you are—or how insulting. Now will you go—or shall I call the operator?"

"Call the operator? That's good. She's gone home. Want to take that rough-neck elevator boy into your confidence about my calling on you? Don't be so silly."

Tom Mason's voice steeled now and took on a deeper tone, more alarming than his maudlinings had been. He laid his hands on my shoulders and brought his face close to mine. I could feel his hot, dry breath on my cheek as he spoke: "Don't be cruel to me, dear. There's nothing to fear. Naturally as landlord here, I have duplicate keys. If any one came in they'd think just what you did at first—that I came to see to the plumbing."

"Take your hands off my—dress," I said tensely, through jaws that wanted to quiver.

He laughed and slid his hands down slowly from shoulders to elbows. The intimacy of that touch seared into my flesh. All in a minute I knew dangerously much about the impulse to kill. And while I quivered with rage and distaste at his touch, he tightened his vise-like clutch on my arms and drew me still closer. I struggled to be free. I lifted by hands and pounded on his chest. I fought and snarled in inglorious, impotent rage.

Then Tom Mason's voice burned triumphantly against my cheek.

"And where do you think Jim is? Have you any idea whose number the boy called—when he found that you weren't?"

HOROSCOPE

"The stars incline, but do not compel."

SATURDAY, OCT. 30.
 This is not a fortunate day, according to astrologers. Although Neptune is in benefic aspect, Jupiter, Saturn and the Sun are all adverse.

It is a time that may be favorable for selling, but all other transactions should be subject to the utmost caution.

Neptune gives promise of good luck to all who travel, especially if they cross the ocean.

There is a sign read as most suspicious for all who have oil interests. New discoveries will cause commercial investigations that may benefit the people generally.

Persons whose birthdate it is should avoid speculation or business risks. The health should be watched, for there may be temptation to overwork.

Children born on this day are likely to be too kind and generous for their own good. They should be trained in systematic business methods.—Copyright, 1920.

PUSS IN BOOTS JR.

By David Cory.

Now as soon as the boat landed on the beach, as I told you in the last story, Puss helped the lovely princess to alight, and then, just as they were starting off for the castle, they heard a voice saying, "Oh, beautiful princess, will you not give me the little blue flower that grows at your feet?"

"Who asks me this favor?" said the princess, looking around to see who had spoken.

And then the fish who had swum at the bow of the boat lifted his head out of the water and said, "I, your beautiful highness."

So the lovely princess stooped and plucked the little blue flower and then she ran down to the water's edge and gave it to him. And as soon as he took it in his mouth he swam up to the shore and then, wonderful to tell, he turned into a handsome prince.

And, goodness me, wasn't the princess surprised! Well, I just guess she was. But Puss wasn't in the least. Oh, my no. He had seen so many strange things in Fairy Land that nothing surprised him any more, except, maybe, a mouse with two heads or a cat without whiskers.

Then the three started off for the castle and after they had gone for a short distance they came to a cross road, so Puss said goodby and went on his way, although the lovely princess begged him to come with her to her father's castle.

Well, after he had gone for maybe a mile or more he saw a boy by a brook playing on a flute. And as Puss drew nearer he saw the boy's feet were those of a goat. But the music was so sweet that Puss forgot this and sat down nearby to listen.

"I am Pan, the musical shepherd boy," said the lad, and then he commenced again to play, and pretty soon a band of pretty maidens gathered around to dance.

"We are the Dryads of the wood," they said to Puss, for, of course, they knew he was puzzled, and that he was a stranger.

And then they began to sing: "Round and round the laurel bush we dance and sing today. We can't keep still by the sparkling rill. When Pan begins to play. For he sings of Spring and each lovely thing."

That blossom each year anew. So around we go in a whirling row, Under the sky of blue. And in the next story you shall hear what happened after this.—Copyright, 1920.
