

LIGHT IN COURT ACCOUNTED FOR

Window Repair Work Permits
Sun to Enter.

The sun shone in Judge Anderson's Federal Courtroom a few days for the first time in many months. Although the room is a place of great brilliance, both in lighting and the quality of the discourse from bench and bar, the light of the great out of doors seldom penetrates. The reason is the key to some interesting traditions.

Heavy dark green velvet curtains completely cover both of the large stained glass windows. The windows form one of the most beautiful features of the room, but only on rare occasions when workmen have to repair them are they opened or the curtains thrown back so they may be seen from the inside. It was this act that let the sunlight in the other day.

The story of the darkened windows as related by Charles La Salle, bailiff of the court for more than nineteen years, is this:

When the Federal building was completed in 1906 the acoustics in the courtroom were so poor that it was soon discovered that the court could not be held there. Judge Anderson found it almost impossible to make himself heard ten feet from the bench because of the numerous echoes which caused about from the deep window recesses, the marble columns and the hard walls, ceilings and floors. The judge served notice on the custodian that something had to be done.

So the old experiment of stringing a gridiron of fine wires from wall to wall near the ceiling was tried, which resulted in little improvement. The window curtains were hung and thick carpet placed upon the floor. This helped and nothing further was done for three or four years. It was not until felt padding an inch and one-half thick was placed in the panels between the marble columns around the walls and in sections of the ceilings that the remedy was found.

If we had only price to offer in this sale, our story would not be half as appealing. Even though eighteen dollars for a suit of clothes is almost an unheard-of proposition, the big point is the unusual quality of the suits represented. Some of the suits are the famous Kirschbaum make, and some are Pettis label, which means guaranteed service. Single and double-breasted styles in cassimere suitings.
