

POLITICAL HEADS OF HOUSE STRIVE TO HOLD QUORUM

Pending Legislation Suffers Deferment Arising From Situation.

FEAR VOTING UPHEAVAL

Republicans Forsee Losing Presidency if History Is Repeated.

By ROBERT J. BENDER
United News Staff Correspondent
WASHINGTON, Sept. 1.—Congress, now rounding out its final work before adjournment—and the fall elections—is manifesting a nervousness detrimental to adequate consideration of important legislation before it.
The reason for this may be stated as follows:
Since the Civil War, every time an off-year election has returned a majority in the House opposite to the party of the Administration in power there has followed, two years later, defeat of the Administration party in the presidential elections.

Democrats Are Confident.
Democrats are supremely confident they are going to carry the House this fall. Republican leaders are equally confident that they will retain a majority of at least fifty in the lower branch.

This, in brief, is the answer to the fact that Republican House leaders are having the greatest difficulty in maintaining a quorum. Only the barest majorities are being recorded both in the House and Senate on routine votes at this time.

The long and short of the present
"jumpiness" of both branches on Congress is the concern to do nothing which might bring an overturn of the present congressional control. Whether justified or not there is always the reminder that if in off-year elections, such as occur this fall, the administration finds itself defeated by the opposition in the House, there follows defeat of the administration in presidential elections two years later.

Even in the Hayes-Tilden election, this rule has followed. In 1898 the country was set to return a Democratic majority in the House. President McKinley, however, in a speech at Creston, Iowa, appealed for a Republican Congress to "stand by the President" during the Spanish war crisis. His appeal was successful and the Republicans returned a narrow majority.

In 1918 Wilson made an identical appeal—but was not supported as Mc-Kinley. The Republicans won the House. Two years later the Republicans won the presidency. It is the reflection of leaders on this unwritten political law that has created the great concern today over the coming elections.
