Dressmaking Series No. 3

Two Patterns Enough for Most Garments

IF you are a beginner it is probably advisable to purchase a pattern for each different type of dress to be made. But the experienced home dressmaker is able to make practically any type of garment from two patterns. One of these is a lining pattern, consisting of two pieces back and front, and the other is a kimono blouse pattern in which the sleeves are cut in one with the body.

Add to these many separate sleeve patterns as you desire, although here again a little experience will familiarize you with the fact that the upper parts of the sleeves are much the same in any type and that the lower part is easily adapted to suit requirements.

In purchasing patterns be sure to get your right size. Read the instructions carefully and do not attempt to cut into your material until, first, you are perfectly certain just what each piece of the pattern is and how they all fit together and, secondly, you have your model clearly in mind and have laid the pattern on the material accurately, according to directions, and have reassured yourself that you have sufficient cloth.

The average width of materials is from 27 to 36 inches for cottons, 42 to 56 for worsteds and 39 to 42 for transparencies and silks. If, as is apt to be the case where the sleeve are cut in one with the blouse, there is piecing to be done, adjust the patterns so that you are sure the line of piecing will not come in an awkward place. It is usually safer to try this out with an old piece of cambric or with newspaper.

The majority of straight-line frocks of today have a belt or sash at the waistline so either the skirt portion is a continuation of the lower edge of the waist and cut perfectly straight or, if there is to be any fullness, it is cut separately in straight breadths with what fullness is desired and joined to the top section.

In either case, no skirt pattern is required even for the novice. This will be demonstrated as we progress.

Next: Hints for general use.

LETTER FROM SAM ATHONTON TO BEATRICE GRIMSHAW DEAR BEE:

I am dictating this letter to one of my men friends who is staying with me for an hour or two while Sally has been persuaded to leave me for a little while to get some needed exercise and air.

Bee, won't you persuade Sally to let me go to the county hospital? It really is the only sensible thing to do, but when I suggested it to Sally she almost fainted.

What is the use of her sacrificing her youth and good looks and health to such a log as I am? Why, if a man becomes, through his own fault, unable to take care of even himself, it should be cause for divorce.

But here I am and she insists that it is up to her to take care of me just as it would be up to me to take care of her under similar circumstances.

Bee, Sally is so devoted to me and makes me so comfortable at any expense to herself financially or personally that it seems to me if I knew how to do it without hurting her more than by living, I would contrive to rid this world of one no-account man.

Of course you know how this awful thing happened to me. It was all my own fault. I cannot help thinking, however, of the great number of my friends who have always drunk more illicit booze than I and yet they have escaped the punishment I am now undergoing.

The worst part of it is that I am ruining Sally's life. She always objected to me drinking, but I thought she was narrow minded, and Puritanical in her ideas. It seemed to me that it wouldn't be quite manly to give in to her when she begged me not to take one glass of liquor.

How a thing like that could get into a man's head while his heart still clamored that nothing in the world was worth anything beside her love, I cannot understand.

Gives Up Position

Sally has had to give up her position with the publishing firm as secretary to the manager, but he has been very wonderful to her. He sends her all the typewriting she can do outside of the office and she also has a number of clients who trust her with typing the final copies of the manuscripts of their novels and stories. One or two of them also deliver their galley proofs to her, knowing that she will probably correct and edit them better than they could themselves.

Although she does not tell me, I know she must be working from twelve to fifteen hours a day and I am sure she cannot keep it up. And it is all for me, Bee—all for me.

Try and persuade her to let me go to the county hospital. She could come to see me often and I know I would be well taken care of—better than I deserve.

I am getting into very good condition with the exception of my eyes and the doctor holds out great hopes for me about their improvement.

Oh Bee, if ever I get where I can work again, I will try and repay this little wife of mine for all that she is doing for me now.

I never knew how much I loved her until I knew how self-sacrificing she could be. If you care for her at all, as I think you do, please get her friends together and ask them to write separate letters to her insisting that she permit me to go to a charitable institution until at least I am better or worse.

It is a queer thing about death, Bee. I seldom comes when we call and yet most of us are not ready when he makes his demand upon us.

Girls Marry for Love, Money or Good Home

Some girls marry for love, some for money and some for a home.

Those who marry for love have the best chance of happiness. Of course, they must be ready to do their part toward building a home, too.

Those who marry for money should know better, after the many unhappy experiences of others who have done this.

Those who marry just to get a home usually either want to escape work or to escape unhappy surroundings. The former make poor wives. The latter can make good ones. But it is useless to try to build a happy home without love.

Wants Home

Dear Miss Lee: I am 17 and considered very nice-looking. I am very popular. My mother died when I was 3 and since then I have been doing from place to place. I always have been used as a slave. My father does nothing for me. I have been writing to a fellow in Chicago for two years. He is very nice-looking, but always is talking about getting paid. Not long ago I met a young fellow in Indianapolis. He is 23 and has been divorced. No one wants to marry him. He is not nice looking, but has an honorable position and earns a good salary. I believe he will make an excellent husband, and I would like to get a good home. I have an old head on my youthful shoulders. Please advise me.

A BRIGHT-EYED ORPHAN. Even though you have an "old head," don't marry yet, and don't marry just to get a home. There must be love in it, or it will not be a home. Surely you could go through another year or two, knowing that soon you would be free to go your own way. You have friends, and that goes a long way toward making unpleasant home conditions seem easier.

Not So Serious

Dear Miss Lee: I am a boy of 15 and I like a girl of 14. She likes me, but she's always trying to make me mad or jealous. I have been mad several times, but always have made up. I am sure I can do this only when some other girl's are with her. Should I break up my friendship, or let her know what's what?

KID H. Pay no attention to these efforts to make you jealous. I don't know why an early 15-year-old boy should be jealous, anyway.

Afraid of Gossip

Miss Lee: I am a girl 17 and have gone with a boy about three years older. I love him with all my heart, but he's afraid I have been mad several times, but always have made up. I am sure I can do this only when some other girl's are with her. Should I break up my friendship, or let her know what's what?
