PROMOTING GROWTH

CHOOSE a position full in the sunlight for growing chrysanthemums in your garden. They are a plant requiring careful and painstaking care to bring them into the lavish bloom for which they are justly celebrated.

When new garden chrysanthemums are received from the nursery as small pot-grown developed cuttings, plant them in soil lavishly enriched with well-decayed manure.

The chrysanthemum is a prodigious feeder on organic matter and needs great quantities of food for proper nurture.

Probably the best manner of planting is to work a shovelful of manure into the spot where each plant is to be set.

Failure to overemphasize the need of sufficient manure and moisture in growing chrysanthemums may lead to failure. Don't neglect this most important feature in cultivation of the species.

If you would have straight and well-developed plants, remove the growing tip to induce branching. It is a good thing to pinch out the top of the shoot after three or four pairs of leaves have formed.

Too much importance cannot be attached to stopping early branching, which should be completed before the middle of July, however. Unless this is done, the plants will develop into great sprawling bushes, yielding poor blooms and crooked stalks for cutting. After the last stopping of branches has been made, give your chrysanthemums an extra feeding of diluted liquid fertilizer in alternate forms of nitrate of soda, sulphate of ammonia or manure.

This extra feeding should be applied once a week before the soil is watered for the day.

Thoroughly hoe the ground about the plants to insure a thick mulch. Stop extra feedings by the time color starts showing in the buds.

It is a good plan to drive stakes close to the plants after they have started to come up to insure erect flowering shoots.

For decorative purposes, it is best to let all the flowers mature into what florists call "sprays of bloom."

Although chrysanthemums, except the pink and white varieties, are quite frost hardy, exposure to the cold of late-blooming plants should be guarded against by some sort of temporary shelter erected over the plants.

Most commonly, a frame is built over the bed on which hotbeds have been laid and the side covered with burlap or similar material. It is best, though, to have cloth sides on the shelter. Roll these up during the day.

Small collections of plants may be grown in pots and kept in the open until danger of frost occurs, after which they should be set in a specially reserved coldframe, with the sash roof raised high enough on corner supports to clear the chrysanthemums.

TOMORROW: Backyard beauties.
