LETTER FROM JOHN ALDEN

It was with great difficulty, Syd, that I kept myself from kicking that old man out of my office, but I thought that was probably just what he wanted me to do, so I restrained my temper and asked with as much a show of calmness as I was capable of.

"Come out with it. What do you want?"

"I want enough money to move away from this town. I want enough money to live on after I am away from this town. I want to take my daughter away where no one can point the finger of scorn at her."

"That got my goat right, Syd. The old hypocrite! In the first place, no one in Pittsburgh would point the finger of scorn at his daughter. A scolding finger would be thrust out at me for being a fool, that's all. You know that as well as I. Things nowadays have changed a great deal since rags were royal raiment, when worn for virtue's sake. That old scoundrel didn't intend to go away. He didn't want to take his daughter away. He just wanted to bleed me and keep on bleeding me."

I was in a tight place, however, Syd. If I didn't pay the old blather-skite, he would raise such a fuss that all the town would think I was neglecting my business and spending my money on riotous living. (How the reformers love to roll those words "riotous living" under their tongues!) I certainly would have kicked him out, but after tomorrow I'm going to ask my bank to lend me $150,000 call loan. I don't anticipate any trouble getting it, as my collateral is A No. 1, but you see the newspaper reports make me out somewhat a rouser—which you know I am not.

And the money powers would just love to get me where they could ask me all sorts of questions.

Good Lord, Syd, why is it that I am one of that kind of men who are not allowed to do the slightest kind of a good act without some one putting a very different meaning to it? I was thinking all these things which I am writing to you and also trying to plan some sort of a way out of the mess when there was a knock at the door and in came Sally Atherton and Maggie Stimpson together.

I wish you could have seen old Stimpson's face! Anger and surprise made it look ridiculous. I think he was more surprised than I was and that's going some.

"Didn't I tell you to stay at home, Maggie?" he said in a very ugly voice. "I told you I'd fix this thing up all right."

"Well, Mrs. Atherton came over to my house and told me that instead of keeping me out of the papers you were over here at Mr. Prescott's office trying to get $150,000 from him. You know I won't stand for that!"

Martha Lee's Column

Recipe for Marital Bliss

Dear Mrs. Lee: During the past week or so I have noticed several letters from unhappy wives. One was losing her husband the other was having trouble with in-laws.

I am one of the really happy wives. In hoping to help others by this letter, I handle my in-laws with kindness. Every opportunity available I helped them, gave them gifts, loaned them money, and was kind and gentle in spite of the fact that they had tried to separate my husband and me and had succeeded when we were first married. Now I am welcome to their homes and anything in their possession. Here is how I hold my husband: I got up first in the morning; have breakfast ready; call him; give him his pipe and light it for him; have his mail ready when he comes in from work; have a clean dress on every afternoon; keep his house clean and neat; make him think I am perfect by babying him; loving him; when he is tired or worried taking him to bed; make him feel that I am his money as much as possible.

When my husband comes home with children, I make him feel that I am his money as much as possible.

A man doesn't care a snap for a crying, helpless woman. If some one does you turn do a kind deed in its place. In time kindness will win them over.
