

SHORTER HOURS SEEN AS CURE OF LABOR ILLS

Union Head Sees Peril in Increased Use of Machinery in U. S.

One hundred million able-bodied workmen would be unable to maintain the present standard of American industry if machinery developed in the last century should be scrapped, according to estimates prepared for James M. Lynch, president of the International Typographical Union, by the union's bureau of statistics.

Lynch is using the statistics to support his contention that any new wage program should include provision for gradual reduction of the hours of labor.

Views Given

"Reduction of working hours inevitably will accompany the readjustment of labor conditions to fit mechanical progress," said Lynch. "The danger to the economic system lies in not recognizing this fact before the harm is done. The Federation has declared the right of the worker to a larger share of the prosperity his labor helps to produce and has also recognized the responsibility of the worker to aid increased production. This is a sharp departure from the old arbitrary demand for a fair day's wage for a fair day's work. Labor is coming to realize that it must strive conscientiously to increase the wealth it desires to share."

"The proposal to limit reduction of hours as rapidly as is justified by industrial advancement will serve a double purpose; first, to eliminate unemployment, and, second, to allow leisure for cultural development by workers."

"The theory that expansion of labor will obviate unemployment as machines displace workers does not cover the case. There is far too much unemployment already resulting from displacement of men by machines. Workers are urged to speed production, then when the saturation point is reached in the market, they are thrown out of work."

Shorter Hours Needed

"It is true that wages have been advanced whenever machines have come into use in an industry, but the problem of labor improvement is not solved when some workers receive high pay, if at the same time other men are walking the streets jobless. Reduction of working hours is the only cure for the later malady."

"Leisure has been the basis of civilization progress. The ancient civilizations of Egypt, Greece and Rome were made possible through

The Illinois Building

A. L. Block, president of Market and Illinois Street Realty Company, announced today that the $1,500,000 Illinois Bldg. at Market and Illinois Sts., will be completed Jan. 1.
