Men Cite Increases as Evidence of Progress—Specific Examples Are Given.

Real estate and property values in Indianapolis are steadily increasing, according to opinion of Indianapolis real estate men.

Gain in property values here has been 100 per cent in the last ten years. This figure was reached after investigation of conditions of the real estate market and is given as official by the Indianapolis Real Estate Board.

Best Gauge

Indianapolis business men point to real estate values as the best gauge of progress.

"Indianapolis, for its size is one of the most progressive cities in the country," said Henley T. Hottel, executive secretary of the Indianapolis Real Estate Board. "The city is developing on every side. To the north we find it built up as far as Broad Ripple, to the east, miles beyond Irvington, to the west, fairly populated to Plainfield and to the south as far as University Heights.
