LETTER FROM SYDNEY CARTON

TO JOHN ALDEN PRESCOTT

Sorry, old boy, I had to come home and leave you, but I knew that you did not need me and some business has come up in connection with an expedition I am joining that needed my attention immediately. I know I am breaking the news to you rather abruptly but not even to you, old friend, could I confide the secret in trust? I have had for over a year of joining, if possible, the Mantel expedition into Africa in search of some sign of the traditional pygmy life.

I'm glad, however, I was over at your house and saw you, Jack, for this last time without either of us knowing it was a farewell visit.

Good-byes of any kind are such ghostly things.

I think that at last, Jack, you are realizing the responsibilities of your position. You will not need me as a balance wheel in the future. Seeing Paula, too, has cleared up a great many things in my mind that I had been pretty hazy about, one of which is the confirmation of my theory that in this world most of us have another chance to rectify any mistakes we may have made. That several times seven we are asked to forgive means not only forgiving our enemies and those that have hurt us, but ourselves and our own mistakes as well.

If, after we have made these mistakes, we could always remember and give up, but begin again, the world would be much better.

I was indeed very glad to see

Paula, although, Jack, I'm not sure it was the sensible thing to open the doors of memory so widely as her stay in your city for a considerable length of time must do. Perhaps, however, you have both grown strong enough not to be in any way swayed by the old sentiment—the old old thrill. Of course, I know I have only seen her once except that time you took her through the mill, and I also know that you cannot keep minds apart without contents separate bodies.

It however, she eventually finds some one she can think of as the father of her children, I hope she will marry, for then she will at least be comparatively happy. Paula Pe-ller has more of the mother in her than the wife.

I'm glad that Leslie is to be back for Paula's loves. It seems to me that those two women were destined
