LETTER FROM MRS. MARY ALDEN PRESCOTT TO JOHN ALDEN PRESCOTT—CONTINUED

Although Priscilla seemed very glad to see me, I could see she was all put on. I knew I was the last person on earth that she wanted to see her eyes upon. She knew that with me in town her hopes of roping in Orson Gibson had gone glimmering.

But, enough of the romantic side of my belated love tale. You, as my son, will probably want to know the condition of my finances, where we will live and what Mr. Gibson intends to do after we are married.

Mr. Gibson has retired from business within the last year on an income of three hundred dollars a month. Of course when this is augmented by my one hundred dollars a week, we will be able to live well, if simply, the rest of our lives. Of course I shall not be able to compete with Leslie's mother but I am sure that we shall have enough to make us of some importance in the little community in which we will live, as we are going to settle down in Winterbrook, my old home.

We are planning to be married tomorrow in the old church where your father and I were married and I am sure that he will look upon this wedding with approval, for he must know that I have not been happy with my children since you married Leslie.

We will take a month's trip to Florida and in the meantime Mr. Gibson's sister, Mrs. Cavetown, will remain at the house. Then we will come back and settle down in the sunshine of life's afternoon.

Dear John, I know you will be very glad that this has come to your mother. Mr. Gibson is a God-fearing man. He looks upon the modern tendencies of jazz and wild living, if not with great disapproval as I, certainly with moderate disapproval. He tells me that the moment he saw me at Atlantic City he said to himself, "There is a woman I would like to make my wife," and while I am too modest to tell him that I had a feeling that I would like to spend the rest of my days with him, yet to you, my dear son, I may confess that such a thought flitted through my mind, at that time.

I shall never again feel that anyone is too old to be impervious to the tender passion.

Give my love to Leslie, although she probably would not acknowledge it. I know she will be selfish enough to be glad to have me comparatively out of her life and I could never be happy in your house as long as I know that she was giving to an unnamed child the love and attention, yes, even the name, that belonged to your son. When Sydney was born, John, some arrangement should have been made so that he could have borne your name. The child that she had adopted could have been sent to some orphan's home.

I am signing myself for the last time by the name your father gave me.

Martha Lee Says
YOU CAN NOT KILL A WOMAN WITH KINDNESS

Can a woman be killed with kindness? In this day and age? Well, she can't. But her love can, just the same as it can be killed when it is undernourished and mistreated.

Love is service. And service is the world's greatest need, embodied in true womanhood. Woman recognizes this need of service. She is usually a born reformer. She preaches about the need of it in every clubhouse in the country. She wants to serve, serve, serve—and when she can't serve her husband, her children, her home, she cuts the channel of her life through new lands—but down in her heart it is her husband, her children that she wishes to serve. She was not meant to be master. And though she has fought for mastery—equality she calls it—when she has attained it she is unhappy. She is rebellious. She is militant. She tyrannizes.

Dear Miss Lee: I've been going with a girl for two years, but I never could understand her ways. Sometimes she calls me a traitor, a coward or a cheat and I've ever dared to be kind to her again she would smack my face. But last Sunday he asked me if I believed she loved me. It doesn't seem like she does. Could you advise me as to whether to believe her or not?

UNBELIEVABLE BOB. Apparently you've never read that story about the woman killed with kindness. There are women who enjoy being the adorable and adored slaves of the men they love. It is perfectly natural for them to wish for male superiority, and it makes them furious and they become tyrants when they are not mastered. Such is your sweetheart, it would seem. Shakespeare's "Taming of the Shrew" is a good example of that sort of a woman, and the treatment to which she responded. She probably calls you "unbelievable" because you do not make love boldly; a "traitor" because you do not fulfill her ideal of you as a masterful man, and "cheat" because you are taking from her her woman's right to be made to submit. If you are a timid, gentle, submissive sort of man, give her up right away. She'll make your life miserable.

If you are the other sort of man she will make you a wonderful mate.

At the Parsonage

Dear Martha Lee: As I have just moved from the country and am going to be married during the holidays I need your advice. If we are married at the parsonage and have an appointment at a certain time, we are not expected to stay and also our wraps off, are we? And is the groom supposed to present the ring at the time of the marriage or before? And does the groom kiss the bride then if the ring is presented at the time of the marriage? Does the bride say "Thank you," or not? On meeting his relations what should I say, or if the bride says "Thank you," or something of the sort, what should I say?

BLUE-EYED COUNTRY GIRL. Be as natural and charming as possible in the first place, or the groom will not want to present the ring either before or during the marriage. I presume you mean the wedding ring, the plain band, not the diamond. The wedding ring is presented during the marriage service. It is taken from the best man's pocket, if you have a best man, or the bridegroom's pocket, and given to the minister when he asks for it, handed back to the bridegroom who puts it immediately on the fourth finger of your left hand—providing he hasn't dropped it or lost it in the meantime. Take your wraps off if you want to, unless you're to be married in such a hurry you won't have time. No don't stay. Certainly the bridegroom kisses the bride. "Thank you" for the kiss or the ring? Well, anyway, she doesn't thank him so publicly. If she's particularly pleased with the choice of ring, no doubt she thanks him, but it isn't a part of the marriage service—yet. On meeting his relations don't be so stiff. What would you say if you were meeting your own people? Well his people are supposed to be your people too, after the ceremony. It shouldn't be an ordeal to be perfectly natural. Make his relations happy that he has chosen you by being genuine—not etiquette-book-ish.

O. J. C. M.: It isn't going to help you or your children for you to where they are than if they were place they are probably better off where the year than if they were cooped up in some tiny place with only your meager wages to support them. You would soon have to be depending on charity. And don't marry any man who comes along just to get your children with you. You may not mind the treatment he might give you, but you must remember he would probably give the same kind of treatment to the children. And men are rare who will take a widow and five children in. Perhaps when they are a little older and more able to help you manage you can have them with you.
