SWEET POTATO PUDDING
Boil five large sweet potatoes until well done, then peel and mash through a potato masher or colander. Place these in a mixing bowl, add one cup of sugar, one cup of milk (sweet), one tablespoon butter. Break one egg into a bowl, add one-half teaspoon ground cinnamon and one teaspoon of yeast powder and beat well. Place quickly in pan. Bake in moderate oven, placing pan over pudding to keep from hardening. Also place pan under pudding when half done to prevent scorching. When done take out and place in warmer. When ready to serve place marshmallows over top and brown.

CORRESPONDENT RAPS WATSON

Wile Says Indiana Senator No Statesman.

"The estimate of Washington is that Senator Watson is a most resourceful and able politician. I know of no trained student or observer, engaged in the task of listing our very few statesmen, who would think of putting him into his list."

Such is the comment of Frederic William Wile, veteran Washington correspondent, author of note, and for years a recognized authority on political matters. Dr. Wile, a title bestowed by Notre Dame University, is in Indiana studying political conditions. He also is conferring with his publishers, the Bobbs-Merrill Company, concerning his biography of Emilie Berliner, inventor of the microphone, which appears this week.

Dr. Wile is convinced from his travel that the strength of President Coolidge is as firm as ever. He is attempting to discover how far the desertion of the Coolidge policies on the World Court and farm relief by Senators Watson and Robinson have affected their chances for re-election.

TALK ON WOMEN'S CLOTHES IS GIVEN

Three Types of Persons, Says Speaker at D. A. R. Luncheon—Tells 'What a Line Will Do.'

"One's body is to one's clothes what the foundation is to the building, and a beautiful gown should not be worn on an ill-kept body a bit more than an architect should construct a beautiful building on a faulty foundation," said Mrs. Blanche Chenoweth, in her address, "What a Line Will Do," given before the members of the D. A. R. at a luncheon at the chapter house Wednesday.

Mrs. Chenoweth is director of household arts at the Indianapolis Teachers College and a member of the faculty on costume design at the Chautauqua summer school, Chautauqua, N. Y.

The luncheon was one of the first of the season's social events at the D. A. R. Chapter house, decorated with fall flowers, used as a background for the display of fashions by three models from L. S. Ayres & Co., sponsoring Mrs. Chenoweth's appearance in Indiana.

Three Types
"Regardless of social status, wealth or environment, women belong to one of the three types—the cottage type, the colonial type, or the Italian palace type."

"It is of the greatest importance for the woman to know her type," Mrs. Chenoweth said, "otherwise she loses the type to which she belongs in her attempt to be something which she is not. It would never more do for the cottage type of woman to wear the ornate costume of the Italian palace type than it would do for the modest brown wren to effect the bright plumage of the parakeet."

Colonial Type
"The demure woman, the home-loving person, who prefers her garden of flowers to society and is conservative always in her dress and ways of living, belongs to the cottage type."

Italian Palace Type
"The Italian palace type is the typical American clubwoman and social worker. She wears tailored clothes well. Always elaborately dressed, yet always good in taste is the Italian palace type person."

Mrs. O. G. Baker, chairman of the chapter house committee, assisted by Mrs. Caroline Thompson and Mrs. Charles Edwards, was in charge of the luncheon. Assisting hostesses were Miss Martha Beeson, Mrs. Walter Green, Mrs. L. O. Hamilton, Mrs. Giles Smith, Mrs. John McLean Lockhead, Mrs. Quincy A. Meyers, Mrs. Joel Whitaker, Mrs. M. A. Potter, Mrs. Edward Hecker, Mrs. Laura Ellen Frame, Mrs. Wales and Mrs. Darrah. Mrs. D. F. Bash was chairman of the decorations and Mrs. Henry Ketcham was chairman of the committee on serving.

GAS KILLS AGED MAN
Dies at City Hospital; Turned on Jet in Room.

Fred Redmer, 70, died at the city hospital on Wednesday night from effects of gas. G. D. Anderson, proprietor of a rooming house at 610 E. Market St., told police he failed to see Redmer leave for work. At 3:30 p. m. he looked through a keyhole and saw him stretched on the bed. Breaking in the door he found the stove gas jet on. Anderson said the man came to his home to live a week ago and since that time several persons had visited him. They supplied his identity.

He was so cruel. Can you not see that you have got him going? "I'm sorry for him, Judy, and ashamed of you. If you must really try to show your power over some one take some one of your own size—take me."

"I wish this dinner were over," I remarked irrelevantly. "I don't like this place."

WORLD WELL LOST FOR LOVE? NOT ALWAYS

Movies and magazine stories can stop at drama. When the hero says, "I love you and nothing seems quite the proper thing for the heroine to do but to throw herself at his shoulder and declare that the world is well lost for love."

In real life it's different. After the dramatic moments, come the matter of fact details of living. If the heroine has laid her trusting head on the shoulder of some other woman's hero, she's got to look the cold facts in the face—sooner or later. Disillusionment is one of the hardest problems to face. It takes a truly brave individual to face, and overcome it, but if one knows he is doing the right thing, the battle will be an easier one.

Loves a Married Man
Dear Martha Lee: Please tell me what to do. For several months I have been going with a young man whom I thought was single. Now I find out that he is married and has two small children. He works where I do, and it would be impossible for me not to see him as long as I work there. He tells his wife he goes out with me, but she won't let him. He says that he is impossible to live with, but he cannot get a divorce on account of their religion. Although I love him, I will do whatever you advise.

WORRIED EIGHTEEN.
My dear girl, the young man has given you a good demonstration of the deceiver he is capable of. Wouldn't you be afraid to trust your future in the hands of a man who could not only deceive his wife, but do what is really a cruel thing to do to a young girl to think of? He has failed to win another's love in circumstances. Every time he tells the woman he loves to love to, that he "don't get along." He has some fair-sounding explanations around, judging cases, his explanation standing in the way of a woman is only an excuse.

Well, you have a tough little problem, my dear, and it's one in which you must be "wise as a serpent and harmless as a dove." I don't believe you should absolutely refuse to go out with your husband or his friends even when you do not like their ways—not at least until you have tried to win your husband to your way of thinking. You can refuse to drink, not in a "holier than thou" manner. Simply say that you do not like the stuff and don't let them coax you to take it. Quietly and gradually, try to bring other friends into your husband's experiences. Plan little affairs with other friends and try to make them interesting to your husband. After a while, your husband will not insist upon going out with his drinking friends. It's simply a case of replacing the undesirable, with the desirable, but in this case, it takes a little time and patience. If you are true to yourself, and are at the same time not condemning in manner, but sweet, patient and firm, you're bound some day before long, to find this problem a cloud that has passed by.

Shall She Refuse to Drink?
Dear Martha Lee: I have been married four months and find my husband like to drink. He has been drinking since we were married and I don't like it. I don't want to drink, but I don't want to have my husband go to the ways of the world. I should like to have him stop drinking, but I am afraid to do this, because I love my husband. QUESTION PAIR IN HODGE DEATH

Truck Driver Confesses Robbery.

Police are still attempting to clear up the mysterious death of William H. Hodge, 1341 S. Belmont Ave., whose body was found in a truck Sunday night, in the rear of 365 W. Washington St. He had left home earlier in the day with insurance money, to pay the funeral expenses of his small son, who had just been buried.

Thomas Spellman, 401 W. Washington St., driver of the truck, who found the body, was arrested. According to Inspector Worley he admitted that he and Harry Harper, 38, of 12
