

DISPLAY NEW CARS IN PERFECT SETTING AT AUTO SHOW

LARGE CROWD VIEWS EXHIBITS ON FIRST NIGHT

Striking Color Scheme Is Used in Decorations; Flowers in Profusion.

SPECIAL DAYS ARE SET

Extreme Luxury Outstanding Feature of Motor Models Being Shown.

When the doors opened on the seventeenth annual Indianapolis Auto Show promptly at 7 o'clock Monday night the public found not only the most striking exhibit of cars in the city's automobile history, but the last word in decorations and display. Everything was ready to the smallest detail at the hour of opening—unusual in any large show.

A color scheme of pale yellow and pale blue was carried out in the hangings and a profusion of artificial and cut flowers formed a perfect setting for the cars. The "Triumph Girls" Orchestra played during the evening and will play each afternoon and night during the remainder of the show.

Large Crowd at Opening

Every effort has been made to assure the comfort and security of guests by the Indianapolis Auto Trade Association under whose auspices the show is held. Adequate parking space is to be had and a special detail of police are on duty inside as well as outside of the building. A service car is provided by the Hoosier Motor Club to attend to any necessary repairs.

Despite the unfavorable weather, a large crowd was on hand at the opening of the show. According to John Orman, auto enthusiasts are seldom kept away by weather conditions.

In conformity with custom president John Orman has named the days of the show as follows: Tuesday, Indianapolis day; Wednesday, Out-State Dealers day; Thursday, City Clubs day; Friday, Society night; Saturday, Everybody's day.

Cars are Luxurious

Noticeable at this year's show is the extreme luxury of the cars on view, and the wealth and variety of color. Upholstery and hardware touch a point of perfection never reached before and are to be found in cars of every size, make and price. Color is an item of unusual importance.

Everything new in the way of colors and combinations is being shown, but conservatism seems to be the keynote.

Dark greens or the quieter shades of green are popular and a great deal of maroon is being used with heavy stream lines to relieve the somber note. Gray, silver, cream and pale yellow are all good in many makes of car.

Leather upholstery is used on closed cars as well as open models and much of it is light in color.

Rich velours, soft rugs and handsome silver and nickel fittings are a note of dignity to closed cars which are in predominance in spite of the swank and style of the sport roadsters.

Factory representatives from all over the country have been unanimous in their praise of the Indianapolis show which they regard as superior in many ways to any show at which they have exhibited this year.

RISK REPLY AWAITED

Lebanon Man's Statement at 'Dry' Meet Under Fire.

Attorney General Arthur L. Gilliom today was awaiting a reply to a second letter to J. Kirby Risk of Lebanon before determining what action he would take, if any, in regard to Risk's statement that the prosecution of Superintendent E. S. Shumaker of the Indiana Anti-Saloon League for contempt of court was "the persecution of a Christian gentleman."

Risk's statement was made at the Indiana "Dry" convention two weeks ago. Gilliom's first letter asked confirmation of newspaper accounts of Risk's statement. Risk replied: "My recollection is that I said this was the 'persecution in court of a Christian gentleman,' meaning thereby that your vindictive efforts to have this Christian gentleman imprisoned at the Penal Farm were on your part a persecution and in my judgment a prostitution of your office."

JACKSON WILL TAKE STAND IN OWN DEFENSE

Has Chosen to Tell All, Jones Says; Amazing Story Hinted.

Governor Ed Jackson will take the stand and tell his version of the story of the alleged offer to Former Governor Warren T. McCray for which he is on trial in the Marion Criminal Court.

This came out through the statement of Defense Attorney Clyde Jones Monday afternoon in the defense address to the jury.

And the chief executive of the State is not going on under pressure by his own attorneys. He has elected to do it himself.

"Governor Jackson will testify in this case," Jones said. "He will take the stand, look you gentlemen in the eye and tell you what this case is. He will open to this jury and prosecutor, his whole life from the cradle to the present."

Jackson's Career Traced

Jones traced Jackson's career from boyhood through his struggles as a young lawyer in Henry County and his seven years as Henry Circuit Court Judge at New Castle.

"Elected Secretary of State, Jackson resigned the office," said Jones, "when the great war came on. He tendered his service to his country, entered the officers' training corps at Ft. Benjamin Harrison and came out a captain, assigned to direct military training at Purdue University, where he served with integrity and distinction."

Honorably discharged a major, Jackson, Jones recounted, was appointed to fill an unexpired term in the office of secretary of State and then was elected and re-elected to the post. In 1924 he was elected governor.

Says Bishop Wanted McDonald

"During twenty or twenty-one years in public life," said Jones, "not one word ever was uttered intimating misconduct against him. Certain persons who have been behind this charge have failed to find one act of misconduct."

"The evidence will disclose that the Governor is no more guilty of conspiring to bribe Warren T. McCray than any man in this jury box. His only connection with the matter of a successor to William P. Evans, as Marion County prosecutor, was at the behest of Bishop H. F. Fout, who asked him to recommend the appointment of James E. McDonald."

"Bishop Fout had no interest other than to serve a member of his flock."

"On Dec. 8, 1923, Jackson spoke to McCray about Fout's request. McCray replied: 'I am going to appoint Remy, but the commission has not been issued.'"

"An hour or two later, Jackson's phone rang. It was McCray calling Jackson to the Governor's office."

Open as a Book

"I just called you in to say that that matter is all settled and that the commission has been issued to Remy," McCray told Jackson," Jones asserted.

"Everything Jackson did is as open as a book, with no effort at concealment on his part."

Jones said evidence might show that others sought to control the appointment by other means, but that Jackson was not involved. He related that "Robert Lyons, who was connected with an organization that supported Governor Jackson in the primary and election, showed Jackson a list of forty-two names of persons that he wanted appointed to State positions. Jackson refused to consider it."

New Sensations Hinted

When charges against the Governor were published in The Times, Jackson was reluctant to make a reply, Jones said, because of his dignity and modesty and because he didn't believe anyone in Indiana would believe the charges.

"Then when he did write a letter of denial," Jones added, "the State said he was guilty because he denied it."

"If the evidence goes deep enough, it will bring astounding and startling revelations. It will be such a sickening story that your hearts will go out in sympathy when you go to your jury room, rather than condemn him."

"Whatever took place," Jones concluded, "evidence will show that the prosecuting attorney had knowledge of the alleged offense more than two years before the indictment was returned, Sept. 30, 1927, and did nothing until he coupled the name of the governor with it."

Steve, Brisk and Confident, Faces Accused Jackson in Dramatic Scene

THE convicted faced the accused in Marion Criminal Court, Monday afternoon and for the first time in almost four years.

This time it was not as friend to friend, one supporting the other in his political aspirations, but as one who has been behind prison walls against another who is making a tremendous legal fight to emerge from the overwhelming shadow.

The one who sat in the witness chair was D. C. Stephenson, former Indiana Klan dragon, one-time boastful of his being "the law in Indiana," now merely a life prisoner in the Indiana State Prison.

The other is at the height of his State political power—he is Governor Ed Jackson, on trial for alleged conspiracy to commit a felony in offering former Governor Warren T. McCray a $10,000 bribe in 1923.

The situation is packed with tense drama.

STEPHENSON took the stand Monday afternoon to tell what he knew of the alleged bribe offer, but was stopped after a few questions by arguments of counsel on whether his testimony would be permitted.

Ruddy-cheeked, his small steely blue eyes boring now into one attorney, again into another, Stephenson sat silent on the stand for more than an hour. His gaze frequently swept the courtroom. He changed his position often and frequently seemed to take suppressed delight in arguments of attorneys.

He appeared little changed from the Stephenson who received Jackson, according to statements made before in court cases, at his palatial Irvington home in 1924, when the gubernatorial candidate would stop in for conferences after speaking tours. He had the same general appearance as the man who sat his well-secretaried and heavily-guarded office in an E. Washington St. building, and received political workers and office aspirants; the man who would pick up dummy telephones and give orders that never went farther than his front office.

"STEVE" looked better physically this time than he has on other visits to the city, when he testified in civil cases and before the county grand jury.

Fifteen feet in front of him sat the highest state executive, listening intently to every word spoken by the witness, although they were but few.

Three times in the afternoon the eyes of Jackson and Stephenson locked—not in that embrace of confidence that must have shown four years ago as they mapped out political plans—but both in a seemingly challenging attitude.
