

HOUSE BLOCKED ON RADIO BILL IN TIME RACE

Dill Proposes New Plan to Break Deadlock Before Midnight.

WASHINGTON, March 15.—Equalization of service rather than physical reallocation of stations has been proposed by Senator Dill as one way out of the chaos threatened through House revision of Dill's radio measure by adoption of the Davis amendment.

With the conferees scheduled to thresh out the radical differences in the two bills Friday, Dill has suggested that stations in less favored zones be given greater power and more favorable wave lengths.

Davis Move Opposed
As interpreted in the House, the Davis amendment would necessitate the actual transfer of stations from the vicinity of New York, Pittsburgh and Chicago to southern and western zones.

Dill would change the language of the amendment to avoid difficulties predicted by radio experts, who say it would undermine the carefully erected structure of the national radio system. For one thing, it is said it would mean junking or transferring at least twenty-seven established stations in the metropolitan area, which would be the chief sufferer.

Meanwhile, Secretary Hoover plans to continue the commission as an appellate body pending adoption of the bill. The commission expires at midnight tonight, and there is no chance of passage before then. But the original law provided that after one year Hoover would become radio czar, with the commission as an advisory and appeals court.

Hoover Foes Balked
Hoover's political enemies, incidentally, have discovered that his assumption of new radio authority may not embroil him in controversies and embarrass his presidential candidacy, as they had hoped.

In framing the radio bill last year, Hoover's foes were animated by the fear it might give him too much power over a new engine of publicity. The bill was framed with a view to restricting his authority, and the job was done so thoroughly that the measure requires the appellate body to take jurisdiction over all matters that "give rise to conflicts."

Construction of Tippecanoe Projects Removes Danger Engineers Say.

Indiana has two major hydro-electric power dams, which together impound more water than was backed up behind the St. Francis dam when it collapsed, spreading death and destruction over a sixty-mile path in California this week, but there is no danger of Hoosier cities suffering such a catastrophe.

The two dams are the Oakdale and Norway power projects of the Indiana Hydro-Electric Power Company a few miles apart on the Tippecanoe River in the western part of the State.

Larger Than St. Francis

The California dam held back 38,000 acre feet or twelve billion gallons of water. The Norway dam impounds 17,000 acre feet of water in a lake ten miles long and from 500 feet to a quarter of a mile wide. The Oakdale dam walls up 25,000 acre feet of water in a body ten miles long and from 1,000 feet to five-eighths of a mile wide. Together they control 42,000 acre feet of water.

The construction of the dams and the nature of the territory in which they are located, however, make a repetition of the California catastrophe, or anything remotely like it, impossible, F. A. Dale, hydro-electric engineer of the power company, with offices at 903 Wild Bank Bldg., said.

Oakdale 55 Feet High

The Oakdale dam is fifty-five feet high and 1,500 feet long. The St. Francis dam was 185 feet high and 1,250 feet long, confining the enormous body of water in far deeper and narrower limits and thereby making it immeasurably more destructive, potentially, than the Indiana projects, Dale pointed out.

The comparatively flat terrain in which the Indiana dams are built made it possible to build them far more safely than the California project.

The Oakdale dam consists of the enormous concrete flood gates and earthen wall, with long stretches of earthen ramparts on either side.

Earth Around Concrete

The earthen works have a center wall of heavy concrete running deep into the earth to prevent seepage and provide a backbone to resist pressure of the water.

The flood gates are capable of releasing in a steady flow twice as much flood water as ever has been recorded in the Tippecanoe River.

The earthen walls taper from a width of 270 feet at the base to a few feet at the top. With such an enormous base, water pressure never could break down the wall, engineers say.

To make doubly sure the power company keeps engineers and competent inspectors constantly on the alert for seepage.

Construction of the Norway dam is similar to the Oakdale.

BLAMES PAVING FOR TAX BOOST

Brattain Answers Protests On High Valuations.

Center Township Assessor Frank D. Brattain today declared the increase in assessed valuation in the district bounded by Sherman Dr., Emerson Ave., Tenth and Sixteenth Sts., was ordered because of recent street improvements and added building activity in the neighborhood.

Replying to the protest of Sherman-Emerson Civic League which named a committee to investigate the increase, Brattain declared the increase "probably would not be one-third." Civic league speakers were of the opinion the increase was 33 1/2 per cent.

Brattain said the increase would be about $516,000 on ground valuation.

"The increase only effects properties on improved streets and where lots have increased in value. Some of the streets have fifteen or more new houses which naturally increased the value of the property."

"The recent paving of E. Tenth St. and opening of the elevation under the Belt railroad also have contributed to building up of the neighborhood," he asserted.
