MARYE and 'MOM' THEIR LETTERS

BY RUTH DEWEY GROVES

Dear darling:
Don't let yourself suffer on account of any Swami's influence in my young life. Your precious child remains true to her money-grub. He doesn't rate it after his behavior at my party but as it turned out, the laughs are on both of us. And I guess a good laugh is one of those realities you mentioned. Anyway, it did as much good as a sermon. Thank heavens, I have a son.

Everything bleached out perfectly. I thing I told you that Florence had as much success with Billy as she'd have trying to vamp the Prince of Wales. He just couldn't see her at all. But one look into the eyes of Alan's blond friend and presto change! he was cured of puppy love. Though what to call it now. For he's in again. With the blond.

Alan saw it right away and began to razz me on the sly because I'd lost my boy friend. But he had to sing a different melody when it became apparent that his gal was in the same gondola that was rocking Billy to sleep. The two have a real case now. I can't see what Billy discovered in her to fall for, but I'm relieved to have him off my hands. And I guess Alan won't be getting any more letters from that particular home wrecker.

Now when I need a driver for services rendered, I'll miss Billy, for there's nothing so pleasing as knowing some one who likes you so much he won't criticise you in little ways like a husband always does.

I've never yet gone to sleep after a party without a harangue from Alan about my errors of the evening. But I notice that he pays more attention to the live wires among my girlfriends than he does to the few who behave as he always advises me to.

Men are problems. They fall for a girl because she is peppy and dresses smartly; then they want to take all the class out of her after marriage. I wonder why they don't pick out the kind of wife they want in the first place and not try to remodel her to suit their heart's desire after the altar scene. They must think we are mental and physical chameleons.

Alan doesn't like my new evening dress because it hasn't any back. But it's fashionable and I noticed him casting admiring glances at a woman who was wearing one like it at the theater the other night. What would you do with a man like that? With much love,

MARYE
