

SECOND KLINCK TRIAL RECALLS 'BIGGER HOUSE'

Great Crowds Jammed Court to Hear Murder Case in 1925.

Trial of the Klinck case in Criminal Court, which has been under way since Thursday, has drawn few spectators.

Defendant Earl Klinck, charged with illegal use of a notary seal in making false affidavit, can easily recall the time when he played the role of defendant to a packed house.

It was back in 1925 and the scene was the Circuit courtroom at Noblesville, Ind. The place was jammed to the doors and many spectators from Indianapolis brought their lunch and ate in their chairs so as not to lose them. The S. R. O. sign could have been hung out from the start of the trial until the finish.

Charged With Murder

Then Klinck was not a solo defendant, but a member of the triumvirate charged with the murder of an Indianapolis girl, D. C. Stephenson, acknowledged leader of the trio, is serving life-term because of that trial.

Third member was Earl Gentry, who may be called as a witness in the present Klinck affair.

But crowds or no crowds, Klinck's conduct in court remains the same. He sits through it all with an amused smile. A huge fellow, he often has been compared to a "gorilla." When he was lieutenant to Stephenson, then self-styled "the law in Indiana" and grand dragon of the Ku Klux Klan, Klinck's function was that of bodyguard to the chief. Gentry performed similar functions. Both were found not guilty in the murder case.

Court Manner Same

Klinck's court manner, both now and in 1925, is illustrated by the high moment in the murder case when Special Prosecutor Charles Cox was addressing the jury. Cox declared to the jury that it was their duty to demand the death penalty.

"These men should be sent to the electric chair, the scaffold," Cox paused to think of other methods of execution he deemed fit for them. He glanced at Klinck. The defendant, with a broad smile, made a motion with his large hand, forefinger extended, across his bull-neck, indicating that throat cutting might be included in this ways and means speech.

By Times Special

"This man," Foulke continued, "received it from the Indiana members of the great party of liberty which won its first triumph under Abraham Lincoln. Corrupt leaders may appear in any organization. It is the tolerance of this corruption which infects the party as a whole."

"But shall it then be said of all Indiana that it is corrupt and contented? Thank heaven, the final decision is still before us. Unless at the coming election we shall put under our feet the conspirators who have debauched our State government we shall have failed in our duty to the commonwealth," the speaker concluded.
