Careerists Still Small Majority Among Women

By NEA Service
"Women still look upon jobs as 'transient,' in spite of the fact that there are approximately 9,000,000 women gainfully employed in the United States," said Rose Schneidemann, head of the Women's Trade Union League.

"Women's primary interests in life and their only permanent ones are marriage, home and babies. Careerists really are in a very small majority."

"With work less and less skilled because of the machine efficiency of this age, this naturally is the case. Running a mangle, stitching seams, punching holes in cans, sorting oranges and other mechanical jobs can never hold the imagination and interest of women."

"The terrific turnover, figured at 100 per cent every five years in one industry, makes the work of organizing women a different problem from that of men, who always face the fact of being the bread-winners and working until they are forced to quit."

"American women, because of this transient attitude, never have come forward in great numbers asking for organization. More and more women are going back to the factory after marriage, but only temporarily. For, unless a woman can earn a decent salary enough to employ help at home, it doesn't pay her to work except when she needs some extra like clothes for the children, a radio, or money to pay for emergencies."
