

Marriage Begins With Slight Chance If Based On 'Love at First Sight'

BY MARTHA LEE

HOW long must a friendship have been formed before it will be developed into love? Some contend that there is love at first sight. I contend there is not. There is attraction, infatuation, yes, but not love.

Often this attraction or infatuation grows into love and because the first "hunch" was right, the result is attributed to love at first sight.

Love, to be steadfast and lasting, must be founded upon mutual likes, compatibility of disposition, common interests and these are things that a first glance simply will not reveal.

They are things that are discovered only after a friendship that allows conversation and companionship. And they are so vastly important because they serve as a stabilizer, a shock absorber for the bumps and knocks of marriage.

Marry Quickly and Repent

A marriage made after a hasty courtship and short acquaintance almost invariably lands on the rocks. Do you know any persons, even members of your own family, who do not surprise you frequently with new and formerly undiscovered sides to their characters? Are there not times when you are disappointed, shocked, amazed at the unimagined traits that are revealed by some of your friends?

If those things hurt you, think how much more seriously you would be hurt by someone you loved very deeply. I realize that these same things are apt to occur if you have known a person for years, but at least by that time you know how to handle the situation, to make allowances.

A marriage after a hasty courtship is most unfortunate because it does not give the two contracting parties a fair chance. It is hard enough to ride over the rough spots when you have studied the nature of the man or woman with whom you are dealing, but to do it sight unseen is almost positive of failure.

Be Sure It's Love

Above all things, learn to detect the difference between love and infatuation. Infatuation will disappear before you can do anything to stop it. It will go as quickly and as completely as it came and for a little reason.

I have a letter today from a young girl who had a "blind date." It was attractive. She only saw him twice. And she is already in love with him, or so she supposes, that she has decided that life will be really nothing without him.

Here is the letter: "Dear Miss Lee, I went on a 'blind date' with a young man and then I had only one date with him. I can't keep him out of my mind. He is just what I liked him. He asked me for a date, I couldn't give it to him because I always have to ask my father first. He told some friends of mine that he liked me, but since I could not give him a date he asked for I have not seen him. I am nearly 19 and he is not too young to be in love, but I think I am near it. I am always longing for the time when I can see him again. When I am at work I am always thinking of him. Sometimes I get in such a state of mind that I am sick. He told me to call him up—we have no telephone. Should I?"

UNDECIDED. I should hate to be envying you, undecided. It must surely affect your work, be thinking of this boy constantly. Your letter is a bit inconsistent. How did you have the "blind date" if you cannot get out to see this boy again? Why did your father allow you to go the first time? As I explained in the first part of my article, it is impossible to really love someone you know so little. Don't call him. If he wishes to see you, he will get in communication with you. In the meantime be a sensible child and pay attention to your arithmetic, or you will find yourself jobless. It's annoying to have anyone moonstruck among the employees.

THE CONNOISSEUR

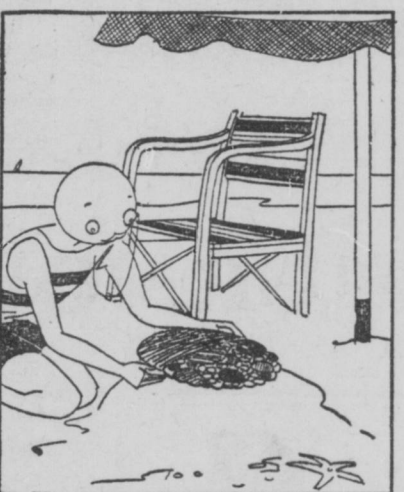

Mr. Van de View is thoughtful as a gentleman should be. And he rises in the morning very early as you see To arrange as easy lounging place along the sandy shore For his mother and his sister—who could ask for any more?

He Gets Beach Ready for His Mother And Sister

On a pile of sand he places with meticulous concern A delightful little mat of rush, for now at every turn They are seen along the beaches just as if they really grew In a colorful array of green and yellow, red and blue.

Close beside he has another, this a basket in design Filled with grapes and pears and oranges, an appetizing line; And beneath a big umbrella he has placed a folding chair Made of painted wood and figured duck, a piece they couldn't spare.

He can see his sister here and there on one and then another But he knows the roomy covered one will please his dotting mother; So he places it exactly where she'll get the nicest view Of the water and the sky, a lovely symphony in blue.

MARYE and 'MOM' THEIR LETTERS

Dear Mom: I'm certainly glad that I invested wisely and wildly in smart clothes before I left Mme. Elsie's shop, for I need all my war paint here.

This hotel is filling up fast, and the majority of the population is of my own sex. I am surrounded by the most snappy and unscrupulous flappers and the most elegantly marcelled and groomed matrons. And it looks as if it were going to resolve itself into a matter of every woman for herself.

Somewhat, I had forgotten the fierce competition that goes on for the elusive male. For a while, I guess I have been riding high, and I haven't felt it. And by my simple system of keeping Alan constantly on the alert looking out for me, he has had very little time to get into trouble himself.

But here, I feel him slipping out of my hands. Undoubtedly all my work will be spoiled if we stay. What with Helen vamping him beautifully, and actually having reduced him to the point of subjection where he will run errands for her, and listen to singing, and with about three others in hot pursuit I long for the good old days when I used to come in with my face smashed up in another man's car, and get a little attention myself.

There is painfully little material for me here. Brother Shelton, whom I regard as my best bet, at the present time, is scarcely my ideal.

He quite frankly disapproves of my language, my accent, my independence and my sunburn. He says I am abominably educated, and have no accomplishments that really matter. And yet, he says I have the most classically cut head, and the best modelled features he has seen in years—and that I am full of unrealized talents and possibilities.

It would have been much better for me, he thinks, to have had a career instead of having married, for now, he says, I will never be more than an enthusiast and a dabbler.

What he is really doing, is trying not to fall in love with me. For in spite of not approving of me, he really likes me, and he fights against

Checker Board Cake

One-half cup lard, one cup sugar, one and two-thirds cup flour, one cup milk, whites of three eggs, one teaspoon vanilla, three level teaspoons baking powder, pinch of salt. Cream the lard, add sugar gradually, add milk, sift dry ingredients together and add gradually. Beat egg whites until stiff and add slowly. Add the vanilla. Make the brown part the same way, but add two teaspoons cocoa with the flour. This should make four layers.

Children's Party

Forty-five children of the Sunnyside sanitarium were entertained at a lawn party Monday afternoon at the home of Mrs. Arthur Brumfield, 3210 N.
