

Love Flies Out Window When Pursued, But Will Come Back If Let Alone

BY MARTHA LEE

WHEN you pursue love it flies out the window, according to those who have made an intensive study of love and its habits, reactions and inhibitions. But it's almost humanly impossible to see love fleeing down the road and sit by idly, without ever an effort to make it stay. Besides how can you tell that Cupid is not just playing tag?

Argue it pro and con, all you want to and the result is just the same. If Love is playing tag, he will be back, when he sees you do not "catch on." If he isn't, if he is really running away, it surely is better to have him go than it would be to drag him back by the hand and through force of one kind or another, hold him there against his will.

Let me tell you, if you do you will have your hands full, for Love is a sly fellow, always looking for an "out" and the first chance he sees to get away, all your dragging will have been in vain. He will be gone and even if you capture him again, his taste of freedom will make him twice as precious about getting away next time.

It seems to me it would be better to cut the thing clean, with one big hurt, than to hang on and see yourself stabbed day after day, little jagged wounds that simply will not heal up, because they are always being opened again.

For somehow Love is a very human little god. He likes to do the seeking himself. He likes the thrill of battle and the conflict of strength, and he hates a coward, and a pursuer. And so, my dears, if you would keep Love at your side, put him on the cheek and give him a gorgeous smile once a day, just enough to let him know that you are aware of his presence, and perhaps once in a while give him a good loving, but if he starts to go, shrug your shoulders and stay put. Then, he might come back.

I have a letter from a young girl who has had Love with her for a short time, but the unfaithful little wretch has played her a trick and she has grown fond of him and wants him back.

Her letter says:

Dear Miss Lee, I went with a young man eight months and then he broke up over absolutely nothing. Since then I have written him several letters begging him to forgive me, but it seems to do no good. He told me he still loves me, but does not think he will ever go with me again.

I love him dearly, Miss Lee, but he will not believe me. He has called me several times a week at his place, but I talk and cry and he just hangs up on me. Do you think I do wrong to call him and how can I win him back?

My dear, what is it you are asking him to forgive? You neglected to explain that and I have a feeling that therein lies the point of the whole letter. You had better write again and tell me about this something that you broke up over that was according to your letter "absolutely nothing."

In the meantime, do not call him at his place, or business, or any place else for that matter. If anyone should do the pursuing it surely is not you. If he loves you at all, he will begin to wonder about you after you have not called him for a few days. It is not disinterested you are showing, but common sense.

If you are in the wrong concerning your breaking up with your fiance, (and I imagine you are, or consider yourself to be from the letter) you have asked forgiveness. That is all you can do. Do not impose upon past friendship by calling him, when he has shown no desire to talk with you himself.

THE CONNOISSEUR

In a rush to get his letter open, Mr. Van de View Drops the drawings on the gallery, a foolish thing to do; While the rescue act he leaves to Binks, the knowing little pup, Who is doing quite the best he can at gathering them up.

What a loss it would have been to miss a picture such as this. For it gives the Connoisseur a very special kind of bliss To be looking at a lightweight tweed with trimming of pique And a flare upon the overskirt—the fashion of the day.

Eve Sketches Coat-Frocks At Chantilly Races

By U. S. Pat. 08.

Now a double-breasted tweed of blue with buttons made of bone. And inverted pleats around the skirt to keep the fashion tone Is another which appealed to Eve and so to Van de View, For their tastes are very similar—and very perfect too.

In a herringbone design another tweed of feather weight Has arisen there at Chantilly to popular estate. With its collar, tie, and cuffs of white plaque with edge of black—Which for trimming autumn dresses constitutes a novel knack.

BIRD CAGE GIVES

ROOM LAST TOUCH

Many rooms fall in their decorative purposes because of one thing—the lack of a color spot. They may be perfectly furnished, the draperies and wall decorations carefully selected and hung but the room just lacks something to finish the effect. The solution in nine cases out of ten is the addition of some picture or ornament to the room which will provide a color center or "decorative climax."

Modern decorators frequently use bird cages for this purpose. They are designed in a variety of shapes and sizes which make it possible for the housewife to get one which will fit in well with the plan and period style of her room. In addition, they can be had in practically any color, ranging from a dull gold to the most brilliant Chinese reds.
