

Dating Problem Solved in Compromise Between Girl and Her Parents

BY MARTHA LEE

HERE is a solution for the mothers and fathers who are confronted with the problem of young daughters wanting dates. At least it seems so to me. It is so sensible, so unbiased, so capable of practice rather than the usual impossible theories. It gives opportunities for the parents to learn first hand just what young people of today are like, at the same time allowing daughter a taste of independence that she wants, at the same time giving her concrete knowledge of the faith you place in her.

This dating-too-young problem has been hashed and re-hashed, due principally because children at fifteen and sixteen believe they should be allowed to have dates with boys, whereas their parents, who see them only as little boys and girls at this age, refuse in most cases, to allow them the privilege.

Now, in my estimation, this is all pretty well out of proportion. In the first place the youngsters get the idea that there must be something very wicked and dangerous about making friends with boys.

They become curious about what it can be that causes their parents to forbid them to talk and laugh and play with the boys they see daily in school, the boys with whom they are being educated.

And, of course you can see, that by all rules of psychology the whole plan is bad. It is always the thing that is forbidden that looks most desirable, most enticing. And, after all, there is no reason to even suppose that it is one or the other.

Young girls should be brought up to think of boys as very good friends and interesting companions, not as some secret vice that must not be admitted.

If these youngsters are refused the privilege of entertaining their friends in their homes, the result will be deception on their part to get out of the house to meet the boys and worse than all that, a warped idea as to what friendship between a boy and girl can mean.

Here's a little girl who has, with her parents, managed pretty well to solve the problem.

Dear Miss Lee: I am just turned sixteen and as most girls, wanted to have dates. I am an only child, but finally my parents compromised with me about how we should manage this problem.

One evening we must stay home and the other we may go out until 11. The evening we are at home my parents entertain my company as much as I, giving me an opportunity to meet the boys I am going out with. Sometimes the boys come in to see me.

I am so thankful for my parents and for the wise way they have handled the situation. I thought this might be a helpful suggestion for other parents who have daughters my age.

That sounds pretty solid and sensible, now, doesn't it? Since these youngsters must have dates, there is a good way to get around things so that everyone is satisfied.

B. R.—It is all right for you to accept a little remembrance from your friends as a birthday gift.

YOUTHFUL—SLENDER

A dignified type for the larger woman, that is youthful and smart at the same time. It is cleverly designed with deep V at front with edge trimmed with applied band that breaks the width through the bodice. It is finished with separate vestee that is rolled in revers with attached collar, that affords opportunity for contrast. The lower front skirt is pressed in deep plaits forming a wide center panel to add length. Two surfaces of crepe satin flat silk crepe in popular two tone effect, georgette crepe and sheer wools are very fashionable and appropriate for general wear. Style No. 3408 is designed in sizes 36, 38, 40, 42, 44, 46 and 48 inches bust and is very easy to make.

YOUR CHILD

School Means New Era

WHEN mother and child part company for the first time on the opening day of school, that is the beginning for him of life's great tragedy.

For the first time he has to assume the responsibility of his own thinking and acting. No longer can he run to his mother with his troubles. No longer does he have that all-protecting arm and that ever-encouraging smile to help him over rough places.

Heretofore he has been king of all he surveyed. There was a higher court, his mother, but he knew full well that this court of last appeal was in sympathy with the administration. Whatever went wrong he was pretty sure to come out on top.

His mother and he understood one another perfectly. He went to sleep at night knowing that all would be well in the morning.

But now! On all sides of him are strange faces. They are in-different if not exactly hostile. No one cares in the least about him or what he does. The busy teacher is concerned with other things. It is as plain as the nose on your face that he might just as well be Jimmy Green or Tommy Brown or anybody on earth for all the difference it makes to her, or the school in general.

There is a queer sinking feeling in his stomach, such as a sailor probably has when he finds himself helpless on a raft in the middle of the ocean.

He is learning a lesson far more important than 2 plus 2 makes 4. He is having his first lesson in manhood. He is discovering that he is a unit in the great order of things—that he has to live his own life and work out things for himself.

He is learning that if the boy next to him makes faces, or the boy across the aisle trips him, or that he cannot get a drink every time he is thirsty, or the pencil won't go the way he wants it—he has to make the best of it. No one is going to take his part, or feel sorry for him.

A mother isn't helping her son by sitting in the schoolroom for the five days of the first week.

She can help him more by talking over his little troubles when he comes home and encouraging him. Instead of being a hindrance to his new independence, she should help him to help himself.

A child thrust suddenly from the shelter of home into the new environment of school should be dealt with carefully and understandingly. A mother should not be too sympathetic, but on the other hand she never should scold nor punish a little child who fails to accommodate himself instantly to his strange new environment.
