Man Admits Wrong, Asks Forgiveness

BY MARTHA LEE
HOW much better it is to pick up the broken threads of our lives, bury the shame that everyone feels at having met defeat through his own foolishness, and struggle on at least trying to make amends rather than to allow past mistakes drag everything good and worthy out of us.

Admire the man who, after having seen the folly of what he has done, says, "I was wrong. I see my mistakes and I want to atone for them." Admire him, and at the same time help him. He is at the point when he admits self-defeat, most ripe for skepticism, cynicism, which two things boded down mean a belief that his fellow beings do not admire a man who admits defeat, rather that they glory in loud and gleeful tones at his ill-luck.

I have a letter today from a man who needs help badly. In many ways his case looks as though he deserved no help, but it is never too late to try to make up for the wrongs we have done, and at least this man has that hope. He says:

Dear Miss Lee—As I have read so many letters from you to others I wondered if you would help me.

I was married to one of the dearest women that ever lived. I took to dabbles in spiritualism and listened to a woman's lies. I believed in the teachings of the religion I followed. And I found out that it was all a terrible mistake.

I am ashamed to go to my family and confess the wrong I have done to them. I live with the woman who broke up my home, but I despise her since I found out that I was deceived by her.

My wife, whom I devoted and made all of whom I love, has five children, but I live with her and she has no children, but I have a change of heart. I have found my wife is now alone. She still is working.

Miss Lee, I am remorseful and want to make up to her in some way. What can I do? My children have all turned me down.

That looks like an impossible thing to ask your wife to forgive, but some women could do it, and perhaps your wife is one of those rare creatures. You should have something to offer her. See that she will always be taken care of and for one thing.

If you are really sincere in your wish to make amends for the wrongs you have committed against your wife and children, go to them, admit your sins and ask to be forgiven. This is surely no time for blustering pride.
