

STONE LAID FOR FORD'S MUSEUM OF U. S. HISTORY

Progress From Frontier Days to Present Will Be Depicted.

The corner stone was in place today and modern devices of work were being to completion a village which will represent America's development from a wilderness frontier to a great industrial nation.

In a simple ceremony yesterday, attended by Ford and Thomas Alva Edison and their families, the 81-year-old electrical wizard lowered the corner stone into position.

Impressed in its cement symbols of American mechanical and agricultural progress. There were footprints where Edison had tacked across the stone, an impression made by the spade of Luther Burbank, one of the world's leading botanists, and a signature, "Thomas Alva Edison."

Located Near Dearborn

The Americana museum is located on a 125-acre tract at Dearborn, it is surrounded by evidences of the newest age in industry, the Ford engineering laboratories and the Ford aviation field.

About the main building, an enlarged replica of Independence Hall, will be a village of early New England homes, shops, an old inn, church and schools.

Buildings for the village were transported almost intact from their original sites in New England States. They will be lighted and equipped according to the period they represent.

Edison "Lab" Reconstructed

Already completed in the museum village was a reconstruction of Edison's laboratory in Ft. Meyers, Fla., constructed forty years ago, in which many of his inventions were conceived.

The old walnut clock, a boiler and steam engine, test tubes, chemicals and lathe, were in place. The inventor threw a switch, starting an
