Riches Hold High Place in Society

BY MARTHA LEE

When folk come to realize that there is no recognized aristocracy in America outside of the aristocracy of money, there will be less unhappiness and heartbreak. And I may add that the only ones who recognize this aristocracy are the nobles themselves.

I'm not trying to decry the present status. Because as it is, it is well enough. Those who aspire to go around with a group of persons who do things they can not afford, for the most part deserve the jolt they must get sooner or later. It is false vanity and pride that prompts that desire for prominence, for the most part.

There was a time when good breeding, faultless manners, refinement and intellect were prime requisites of society. These are still necessary attributes, but added to this is another, superseding in power all the others—wealth. That is indisputable, and the sooner it is faced the better.

And those who can see the good in the one group and yet sympathize and understand the miseries and stark tragedy of the others are twice blest. Those who have seen the heights and the depths are surely at least spiritually more fitted for civilization and the furthering of civilization than those who have trod the even plane of mediocrity. Here is a letter that might interest my readers:

My Dear Miss Lee: I am twenty-two years old. I have a fairly good education and quite a bit of family background. During the war my father, who was an outstanding financier in the community where we live, lost all of his money, and as a consequence his life was broken. Tragedy visited my family en masse, and without any warning, without any previous training for the situation, we were forced into actual want, due to a lack of knowledge as to how to handle affairs.

Before this occurrence my mother and father and sister had been invited everywhere. Mother and my sister were forced to take up the burden of the family and in time, we were dropped from the circle. In the meantime things are looking up a bit, and I am being asked about. But I am not so much interested in the things these people who meant and still mean so much to my mother and father. I have found my own circle of friends, a group of serious minded young people, with fair educations, who are interested in the same things that I am. Although we dance and enjoy life, it is not in the same way that I find these others do. And the other ways are so much more to my liking. Mother has stressed the idea that I owe it to myself and my family to take my place in this group. Understand they mean it, but there is a vast difference in my idea about life and theirs. It is something earnest and real to me. To them it is just fun. What do you advise?

BURGOISE. Make a concession to your mother. Since it will not mean any struggle on your part, take up your life with the group your mother wishes, at least for a time. And do so with a sincere effort to become one of them. If you find it impossible, there are always your own ideas to follow through. But your mother has suffered a great deal. If you can not show her your way, at least make an effort to do what she wishes. If your arguments are strong, they can overbalance hers.
