

NEW LINGERIE FOLLOWS LEAD OF FLARED SILHOUETTE

Wrap 'Round Stunning in It's Beauty

BY JULIA BLANSHARD
NEA Service Writer

NEW YORK, Sept. 5.—New lingerie follows the lead of the flared silhouette and in utterly feminine and charming manner features most of the salient style points of the costumes that top it. Plain fabrics are more stylish than prints. Lace is an ever present aid to chic.

There are princess slips and stunning little wrap-arounds that belt themselves to further mark that returning waistline.

Slips, nightgowns and dance sets all feature flared effects, with godets and lace and pleated panels two of the most popular methods of getting the necessary fullness.

There are backless slips, teddies and nightgowns, one-shoulder effects in contrasting lace or color, dipping hemlines, one-sided flares, bounces, ruffles and much intricate handwork, just as there are on frocks today.

Mark the Waistline

The marked waistline is one of the innovations. Many slips and combinations have fitted belts and button up the back in a style reminiscent of quaint days of long ago.

Normal waistline is the rule, but some raise the belt until the old-time empress line emerges.

Lace is used in abundance, all kinds of it, mostly in ecru. There are lace flounces, lace panels, panels of fabric outlined in lace insertion, yokes, godets, and ruffles of lace.

One of the neatest uses of café au lait lace is to fashion a princess bodice on a sheer blue chiffon gown. A blue satin ribbon threads the lace at new empress line, making the gown charmingly novel.

More goods are used in all kinds of underwear. Not that means things are bulkier, for the neat way they are cut and manipulated gives lingerie today a svelteness that is almost glove-like, in some instances.

Materials are Varied

Materials used are of tremendous variety. Rayon steps to the fore as a delicate contender for honors in lingerie. Many original imports feature rayon nion, georgette, flat crepe and unfilled knitted weave.

Plate crepe is perhaps the general favorite, for it washes so well. Chiffons are used less, satin has a good run, nion is quite the choice for the many of the daintiest.

Pastel colors are in favor, but flesh and deeper pinks indicate that once styles have gone feminine, mild demands flatter colors. Pale blue, almost a baby blue, is excellent, while eggshell, peach, white and coral are good.

A green rayon nion dance set, throws the flaring silhouette into high relief. It is a sweet little set, with café au lait, lace and nion making little tiered circular panties and the strapless brassiere attached to the pantie yokes in front.

Another original import that knitted rayon is a flesh-colored slip that gets its flare by frankly using godets. It does it swiftly, with the godets pointing smartly into a scalloped lower edge. This has the suntan backless line.

FLARE IS FEATURE TOUCH FOR THE NEW 'UNDIES'

There's a flair for flare in new lingerie. Left to right: A little wrap-around Suzanne Talbot slip in peach-colored rayon georgette has peach and green ruffles and a narrow belt. A new empire line is emphasized in a sheer blue chiffron and café au lait gown by a blue satin ribbon. Very new is the silhouette of a green rayon nion lace dance net that attached its low-necked brassiere to the circular panties at the front waistline.

Interprets the MODE

It would not be so very rash at the moment to predict that before many seasons we shall see really, honest-to-goodness trains on evening gowns. The summer of 1929 very well may go down in fashion history as marking the end of the short skirt for evening.

Already we are at the point where a woman wearing a more or less short evening gown appears definitely out of fashion, if not actually a bit ridiculous.

To be sure, certain of the Paris creators still are making concessions to the taste of their American customers, who, it appears, demand the right to display their well-formed limbs on all occasions. (And not without reason, for surely no country can compete with us in that direction!)

THEFORE, to cater to the American taste, many of the evening gowns strike a happy and attractive medium by being a short-skirted evening gown with a mass of panels and volants of greater length.

These, in walking about, give the grace and symmetrical line of a long dress, but when one sits down she naturally sweeps these to one side, leaving the aforementioned shapely limbs displayed to their best advantage. (And don't forget what we have told you umpty-ump times about the unloveliness of not wearing bloomers. . . .)

But the fact remains that the effect, as a whole, grows longer and longer, and it would seem logical and even inevitable that in a few seasons the volants will cease to be volants and become trains.

Silken rope shelves on which to put your hat-stands and your shoes, new and different baby pillows, this and that dainty idea for your boudoir! Just send a 2-cent stamp to the Dore department of The Times! You want to know about them, don't you? The things to do to make your boudoir lovely! Our leaflet tells you!

A READER wants us to "once in a while have some patterns or hints for the elderly stout females." But you see, we do anything sketched, which has up and down lines instead of those going from right to left, are for plump people, whether they be elderly or not. And then every now and then we tell what colors are best, and which should be avoided. Watch for them!

SO sorry, we have no pamphlet on what to put in a hope chest! There is a book for brides on the market, however, which tells you most everything under the sun about such things, as well as what you and every one else should wear to different types of weddings.

MR. AND MRS. MALOTT ISSUE INVITATIONS
