

'DIVORCED,' BUT FINDS HIMSELF STILL MARRIED

Druggist Shuttlecock in 'Game' Between Judge, Supreme Court.

By United Press
BEAVER DAM, Wis., March 21.—Paul Seyfert, Ozaukee county druggist, found himself still married to the wife from whom he obtained a divorce two years ago when a judge who reversed himself and then reversed his own reversal was himself reversed by the Wisconsin supreme court.

The druggist sued his wife Annette for divorce and was granted an absolute decree on grounds of cruelty, March 19, 1928, by Judge C. M. Davison, Beaver Dam. Mrs. Seyfert was not satisfied with the decision and on Aug. 17 Judge Davison amended the previous order, giving Mrs. Seyfert a better settlement.

Set Aside Decree

Angered by the later action of the judge, Seyfert brought out certain facts which had not been aired at the first hearing. Judge Davison decided something was wrong and on Dec. 3, 1928, without notifying either Seyfert, his wife or their attorneys, set aside the divorce.

Judge Davison then cited Seyfert for contempt, on Aug. 24, 1929, for not making payments under the order of Aug. 17, 1928, which he considered still in force although he had set aside the divorce.

Later, Judge Davison reviewed his previous decisions and came to the conclusion that he had erred in setting aside the divorce and on Sept. 30, 1929, ordered the decision of Dec. 3, 1928, null and void. Seyfert immediately asked the supreme court for an interpretation of his status and to learn if he was married or divorced.

Ruled Irregular

The supreme court held that Judge Davison's action in setting aside the divorce without notifying the parties, was "irregular," but that it was legal. It ruled, however, that the jurist had no power to set aside the divorce reversal order of Dec. 3, as more than a year had elapsed since Seyfert's divorce was granted.

Under this later ruling, Seyfert still is a married man, but is not liable for contempt action as the Sept. 30 ruling had no existence.

TEST PROVES MONKEY IS NOT COLOR BLIND

Finds Little Difficulty at Eating Time in Discriminating.

By Science Service
BERLIN, March 21.—A monkey can tell the difference between colors, at least when he has been taught that one color means dinner time and another doesn't. It has, of course, always been assumed that monkeys know colors, but there was no real proof that they were not color blind.

The test that proved the color sense was carried out by Professor W. Trendelburg of the Berlin Psychological Institute. He put pieces of apple in a box in the monkey's cage. When the box was filled he illuminated it with yellow light; when it was empty he used light of other colors. The monkey finally came to know that yellow signaled "food" and that other colors meant "no food." Consequently when other colors were flashed on the box, even though it contained pieces of apple, the animal paid no attention to it.

The critical test came when a color shade approximating yellow was thrown on the box. Then the monkey appeared to be restless, unable to make up its mind just what it should do.

French Pilot Completes Equivalent of Twenty-eighth World Flight.

By United Press
PARIS, March 21.—The French aviator, Charles Corbin, commercial pilot for the Air Union, has rounded out the equivalent of his twenty-eighth trip around the world.

He has had the unusual record of flying 6,612 hours, a total distance of 675,000 miles, and has carried 15,000 passengers, all without the slightest accident. His record is believed unique in the history of aviation.
