

DURANT PLANS NEW DRIVE IN AUTO INDUSTRY

Three Executives to Quit; Small Car to Rival Austin Is Hinted.

DETROIT, Aug. 7.—Will C. Durant, financial genius, who twice has headed General Motors, today appeared ready to step into the automobile industry limelight again. Durant announced at Lansing that three chief executives of the Durant Motor Company would retire shortly and indicated that Durant Motors soon would be allied with strong European automotive interests. Leaders of the automobile world and financial circles awaited impatiently for Durant's next move. For a year and a half he has been more or less in the background, having turned over the direction of the company he controls to others.

It was understood he will not assume active direction of his company now, although there has been no intimation as to who will replace those men who are to step aside. The retirement, within the next few weeks of A. I. Phillips, chairman of the board; Frederick J. Haynes, president, and J. A. Nichols Jr., vice-president, was Durant's principal announcement Wednesday.

Three to Step Aside
The three are stepping aside, it was believed, to make room for new men expected to come into the Durant organization through the alliance with European automobile manufacturers. They are retaining their Durant holdings.

While the reports were not confirmed, it was believed the new Durant tie-up will result in the manufacture at Lansing of a small, low priced car to compete with the Austin, English-designed automobile recently introduced to the American market.

Durant, dynamic and forceful, twice has seen General Motors slip from his control. The founder of the organization some twenty years ago, he lost control, then started the Chevrolet Motor Company, with Arthur Chevrolet as nominal head.

Prominent in Industry
When Chevrolet became powerful it was taken over by General Motors, and Durant went with it, back to his old concern.

Again he was forced out of control around 1922, when the present controlling group came into power. It was not long, however, until Durant "came back" again, this time manufacturing the Star and the Durant.

He remained active head of his company until January, 1929, when he stepped aside for the leadership of the men whose retirement he announced Wednesday.

CRACKSMEN ESCAPE

Woman's Cry Frightens Two at Work on Safe.

A woman's cry saved two cracksmen from capture by a police emergency squad early this morning.

When police squads made a silent run to the John Roeder pool room, 448 North Davidson street, where two cracksmen were reported at work, they missed the hunted men by thirty seconds due to the fact Mrs. Emma Russell, living over the pool room, saw the men and cried out from an upstairs window.

One man had entered the pool room, according to Le Roy Wallace, 728 East Michigan street, who telephoned police when he saw them at work. The second pounded on the rim of an automobile wheel to deaden the noise while his companion knocked the combination off the safe. Unable to open it, the two were attempting to move it from the pool room and load it into their automobile when Mrs. Russell alarmed them.

The automobile, stolen, later was found abandoned at Garfield park.

GUARD AGAINST ELECTION FRAUD

Tennessee Goes to Polls in Governor, Senator Race.

By United Press
MEMPHIS, Tenn., Aug. 7.—Tennessee voters were choosing party candidates for senator and Governor today with rival factions keeping a close watch at the polls for possible election frauds. State and local issues were the chief points at stake, and national policies entered in only a casual fashion. Prohibition was no issue, for every candidate for important office in Tennessee is assumed to be dry.

The Horton-Gwinn race for the gubernatorial nomination drew the greatest attention. The candidates are Democrats. Gwinn forces centered their attack on Horton's administration of highway funds. They indicated their fear of election frauds, particularly in Memphis.

Cordell Hull and A. S. Todd opposed each other for the Democratic senatorial nomination, long term, and Senator W. E. Brock, serving the unexpired term of the late Senator Tyson, was opposed by John R. Neal. Hull emphasized his friendship for the farmer and announced himself ready to support all practicable plans of farm relief. Todd promised, if elected, to lay before congress an intricate scheme of excess profits taxes, the revenue to be divided among the states for support of schools, highways, and public health work.
