

VELVETS TAKE COMMANDING POSE IN STYLE SPOTLIGHT

Wide Variety Is Shown in New Fabrics

BY JEAN PATOU
Written for NEA Service
PARIS, Dec. 1.—The use of velvets is almost inevitable in the creation of a winter collection, but this year they figure more conspicuously than ever before.

Despite this preponderance of velvets, however, the fabric is in itself so varied in its different presentations that there never can be the slightest hint of monotony about it.

Beside weight and weave, there also are degrees of suppleness and brilliancy in the various kinds of velvets and all these features are important.

There are certain models for which only velvets woven in a particular way can be employed and in many instances the weight of the fabric has a direct influence on the style.

Adds Welcome Variety

For winter wear, velvet alone is capable of bringing a decided change from the usual woollens and dull surfaced clothes reserved for daytime wear.

An added advantage is that almost any kind of fur harmonizes with it and for that matter, it can very well be combined with any other fabric.

Ermine is set off best by a velvet gown or ensemble, sables gain even more sumptuousness if used to trim a velvet coat. The Vogue for lingerie sets on afternoon gowns is seen at its best when the gown is of velvet.

On the other hand, a collar and cuffs of real lace or finely hand-worked lingerie lend that touch of fantasy indispensable to such fabric, in which the more intricate details of cut are not so easily discernible.

For Formal Day Wear

The long afternoon dress of velvet is, to my mind, the perfect type of present formal afternoon wear.

Less formal, but just as becoming, is the afternoon ensemble of velvet consisting of a dress and coat, the former with the required touch of lingerie at the neck and sleeves and the latter, preferably short, banded with fur.

Thus, as a matter of fact, is a type of afternoon ensemble adopted by the smart but practical woman.

The increased use of velvet in clothes has led to its wider use in hat modes, with the difference that anything that passes through the hands of a Parisian modiste invariably acquires all the fantasy she is capable of.

Velvets lend themselves admirably to all the intricate work of rucking, honey-combing, and incrusting that is being put into these rather reduced hats this season, besides completing the harmony of the ensemble.

Make Your Dessert and Meat 'Match'

BY SISTER MARY
NEA Service Writer

Since first and last impressions are considered the most important, it behooves the home-maker to choose her dessert with care.

There are luncheon desserts and dinner desserts, "company" desserts and "family" desserts as well as the "party" dessert, which is quite elaborate.

Both the type of the meal and the variety of meat served are determining factors in the choice of desserts.

A simple farmhouse dinner would be incompatible with a fussy

Daily Menu

BREAKFAST—Grape fruit, cereal, cream, scrambled eggs, crisp bacon, graham and raisin muffins, milk, coffee.

LUNCHEON—Cream of tomato soup, croquettes, sweet potato salad, whole wheat bread and butter sandwiches, lemon pudding, cocoa.

DINNER—Flounder in parsley sauce, twice baked potatoes, buttered spinach, jellied celery and cabbage salad, apple dumplings with cream, milk, coffee.

French dessert, and by the same token a formal meal demands a "smarter" dessert than apple pie.

Light Desserts Needed

Rich meats like pork, beef, mutton and goose require light desserts free from fat and, especially in the case of pork and goose, with a tendency toward tartness.

Fresh fruit in season, fruit in gelatin, fruit flavored gelatines and ices, deep-dish fruit pies and perfectly baked fruits are excellent selections for these dinners.

Light meats like veal and lamb need a more nutritious dessert. Since veal itself is rich in gelatine, the dessert should not be jellied unless it is a natural fruit jelly.

Veal is lacking in fat, so this can be supplied in the dessert. Lamb, however, does not require a dessert particularly rich in fat. Since the flavor of both these meats is mild, this, too, must be taken care of in the dessert.

Carmel Custard Good

Carmel custard is a good choice for veal; chocolate or fruit souffles, one-crust pies, seasonal fruit used in puddings with a rich sauce, almost any flavored ice cream made rich with cream and eggs—these are excellent for either veal or lamb.

Tradition has much to do with the dessert preferred for poultry and turkey. These usually appear on festive occasions when a fancy concoction is in order. Frozen puddings, bavarian creams, charlottes and French pastries all go well with poultry.

The dessert that perfectly finishes the meal should form as great a contrast in flavor and texture with the courses preceding it as possible.

Errors Easily Made

There are a few mistakes easy to avoid. To serve a fresh fruit after a fruit salad, to follow an omelet with a custard or a meat pie by pastry, to serve a jellied dessert after a jellied salad—these are simple errors in judgment that break the first rule for choosing the right dessert.

The season of the year also influences the choice of the sweet course.

Spicy steamed puddings are appetizing for cold winter days, but would fail to please during hot summer weather.

Aside from all this, the dessert should have a definite, active part in the meal, not just something added as an afterthought because it is sweet or tastes good.

Your Love Problems

BY MARTHA LEE

Dear Martha Lee—I bring my trouble to you hoping you can help me. I am the mother of three children. I try hard to be a good wife and mother, but I get only cruelty from my husband. He is not only cruel to me but to the babies. He wants me to go to work, but I feel that if I give up my babies for work, I'll give up the curses and all that goes with them.

If I would leave and place my children in a boarding house, could he be made to pay their board?

A WORRIED MOTHER.

Stop and think things over. You'd be a lot worse off if you left your husband. Surely you wouldn't be any happier separated from the children. If he refuses to support you, refer the matter to the proper authorities.

Dear Martha Lee—My husband left me more than a year ago to serve time in prison. I was going with another man at the time I married my husband, and hurt him when I married. The man I married knew I had a baby, but I was afraid to tell him. When my husband left, I wrote the first man and confessed everything. He still cares for me and wants me to get a divorce and marry him. My husband cared for another's child for four years. May I have your opinion? My husband still loves me, but I still love the other—CHARLINE.

Loving him or not, you married your husband. If you have any loyalty, you'll stick with him in his trouble. He overlooked your transgression. Show your gratitude, at least.

Dear Martha Lee—I am the mother of three children. Two by a former marriage. My husband to whom I have been married two years, expects me to run the house on my children's support money of $10 a week. He makes good money and he all pays at home is rent and fuel. He goes out two or three times a week, and since the baby came, won't take us any place. Do you think it is right to use all my children's money for the house?

You must make your husband contribute to your support. The courts will do it if necessary. Your children's support money should be used only for them and a little saved each week, if possible, for their education.

Dear Martha Lee—I am 19, married and have a little girl. I am very dissatisfied. My husband is jealous, has a terrible temper, and makes my life miserable. We live with his parents because his mother will not allow him to go. Other men have

Tricorns, Bicorns, and Turbans Take First Rank Among Hats of Season

BY JOAN SAVOY
Written for NEA Service

THE winter's little vanities called hats demonstrate that beauty certainly has gone to the heads of fair ladies.

Of all the pretty headgear, two outstanding types of hats have won the greatest popularity and chic. You probably have both on your shelves.

First come the almost universally becoming tricorns and bicorns. They are utterly feminine and flat-

Glorifying Yourself

BY ALICIA HART

JUST as the end of a rose stem sways gracefully to heighten the beauty of the bloom, so a woman's wrist is responsible for half the eloquence of her hand.

If your wrists are stiff, unresponsive, awkward, your hands will lose that rhythmic, fluid character that makes them hauntingly beautiful.

You can cultivate flexibility. The hands of a musician or an artist always fascinate. Their very usefulness has charm. But more than that, they are themselves eloquent.

Every muscle is exercised, the fingers and palm respond easily and quickly to aid and abet the work he speaks or the meanings that his eyes betray.

The wrists have their own responsibility in his work and they too have that ready ease of movement.

GOLF, driving a car, riding a horse or even such mundane things as sewing a fine seam, polishing beautiful crystal, or even massaging the face—all these exercise the wrists.

However, if your wrists stubbornly resist in being stocklike, try the following exercises. Mornings and nights, let your arms limp at your sides and then shake your hands this way and that, commanding the movement with the muscles above the elbows.

When your wrists seem loosened by this shaking, stiffen your arms and rotate your hands at the wrists, trying to make complete circles with your finger tips.

Next, bend your arms at the elbows and do this same rotary movement, about ten times with each hand.

***

AFTER this is done, hold your arms out in front of you, horizontally, and shake your hands up and down, quite vigorously, as if waving to some one.

Then you are ready for the five finger exercises you may or may not have learned as a child taking music lessons.

If you did not take them, the exercises consist in strumming on your dressing table or the arm of a chair, each finger raised in turn and pressed down in staccato motion, as if you were striking a piano key with each one.

Bending the hand backward and then doubling it up is also a good exercise that can be done anywhere, anytime. But have your hand as limp as possible while doing this. The whole secret of wrist grace is limberness.

When massaging the hands, always massage the wrists, moving the fingers slowly but firmly up and around, from the hand. At night, leave nourishing cream on the wrists. If your wrists are discolored, try a bleaching ointment.

Next—Care of arms.
