

FLYING WRITER FINDS CHILEANS GOOD FARMERS

South American Republic Makes Impression on Air Traveler.

This is the tenth article by John D. Montgomery, written during an airplane trip around Central and South America.

BY JOHN D. MONTGOMERY

Chile is delightful, and particularly Santiago. But what an unusual shape for a country! From a ship in the Pacific ocean, one can see the tops of snow-capped mountains in Argentina—clear across Chile. Chile is 3,000 miles long, but only ninety miles wide.

Valparaiso is the largest seaport in South America. Santiago, three and one-half hours by express from Valparaiso, is the largest city on the Pacific in South America.

On the train from Valparaiso to Santiago, I noticed the beautiful scenery, fine farms, progressive farmers, with modern machinery, clean homes and such obvious sights that make a good impression on any one who has been in the other sections of the west coast of South America.

I arrived in Santiago to witness the spring festival—a celebration that makes the New Orleans Mardi Gras look like a county fair. Every one takes a part.

During the time that the celebration of the welcoming of spring is on—Saturday morning through Sunday night, the streets are filled with costumed people, decorated cars, expensive floats and jolly crowds.

The climax of the carnival comes with the parade in honor of the queen on Sunday night. The streets were lined with spectators.

Held in Death

Mrs. Helen Grant Thornehill, shown here with her son, Grant Hollister, faces trial at Santa Cruz, Cal., on first degree murder charges in the death of her husband, Leslie Thornehill. She is accused of shooting Thornehill at a mountain cabin party.

and the cars were two abreast and moving in one direction on one side of the reviewing stand and in the other direction on the other side.

I was surprised at the way the Chileans can spot an American in any crowd. I yelled, "Adios, Linda," as all the rest of our party did, at pretty girls lining the sidewalks and they shouted back, "Muchos gracias, gringo." My greeting stood out like a bandaged thumb.

DRAMA TOURNEY BEING PLANNED BY ASSOCIATION

Spelling Bee to Be Held at School 62 Tonight.
