

Business Women to Convene

Discussion of the contribution of the service clubs to the welfare of the United States will be discussed in 1,250 communities during national business women's week, at public relations dinners Thursday when representatives of service organizations will be asked to summarize exactly what their groups have done for community progress since they were organized.

Other projects suggested to business and professional women's clubs during the week are business equipment shows in which merchants exhibit all up-to-date appliances which are recommended for modern offices; educational programs focusing upon adult education; fellowship luncheons at which the business and professional women in each community are honored and vespers services for discussion of what contribution the modern business woman can make to international relations.

What's in Fashion?

'Ladylike' Spring Details

Directed By AMOS PARRISH

NEW YORK, March 7.—Fashion is a lady now. And quite a lovely one, too, with all the little tricks of modesty and dignity that gave the real old-fashioned ladies so much of their charm.

This spring there's nothing bold or brazen about fashion. No loud, startling effects designed to get attention. Quite the other way, in fact.

Just see how fashion has changed lately. Bare shoulders for daytime are going out of date, and getting out of fashion. Covered shoulders are in fashion. They're more ladylike.

Instead of the sleeveless dresses you used to meet walking down the avenue, spring fashion's more ladylike dresses have cap sleeves or sleeves that reach to the elbow.

When dresses are sleeveless, they're more apt to be worn for active sports, or are dresses that have a little matching jacket to be slipped on when you go out.

Even the short-sleeved dresses have jackets, so that on the street the arms are quite covered. In fact, this jacket costume—the dress with its own jacket—is one

Gloves with short sleeves

If a jacket doesn't go with the dress, and the sleeves are short, fashionable women put on gloves. Gloves long enough to cover most of the bare part of the arm.

Gloves Are Longer

Six-button, eight-button, even twelve and sixteen-button gloves. Fashion-knowing women who know it's smart to be ladylike are choosing all these lengths to wear with their dresses whose sleeves aren't long.

Along with covering up the shoulders, covering up the neck is in fashion. Not entirely covering it, of course. But covering up more of it than used to be the fashion.

A "ladylike" scarf neckline

Nearer the base of the throat is the fashionable height for necklines. You'll find cowl necklines draped higher, the point of a V-neckline not so deep, a suit or a coat closing higher up in the front; scarfs attached to dresses, suits and coats to fill in empty spaces.

Collars Tie Near Throat

Some of the newer fashions have little standing collars that tie close to the throat, high-fastened turned-down collars, or quaint oval necklines that just follow the line of the base of the neck.

Many separate scarfs are used, too—as you know—to take the bare look from a plain neckline.

Fashion is ladylike in her skirt lengths, too. That's not new. She has been that way for a year. But she's even more careful about it now than she was.

It's rarely you ever see a street dress shorter than middle calf now. Of course, you mustn't get the impression that because it's ladylike, fashion is dull. Because it isn't.

It's even more exciting than it was—because these ladylike tendencies add new ideas to almost every costume.

Fish Is Fine for Health Year Around

BY SISTER MARY

NEA Service Writer

It is the custom for many housewives to serve fish regularly once or twice a week during the Lenten season, but every woman would do well to do this throughout the year, for fish is a delicious and nutritious meat equivalent.

Like meat, all varieties of fish are rich in protein and contain variable amounts of vitamins A and B so essential to human growth and health. Sea fish contains iodine in variable amounts.

Fish is recognized as an excellent food for children and one which can easily be served at the family table.

If adults must have a highly seasoned dish, this can be supplied by the sauce, which should be served separately.

Buy Good Fish

If you want your family to really like fish, be sure to select a good quality, remove bones, if possible, before serving, and use great care in cooking.

Keep in mind that fish are "seasonable," just like fruits and vegetables. In selecting fresh fish, look for these points, bright eyes, bulging and clear; gills bright red in color; skin bright and shiny; flesh firm and elastic. The dealer should always scale, clean and bone the fish for you.

The variety of fish chosen usually determines the method of cooking. With the exception of large fish that are wanted served whole for some special reason, broiling seems to be the ideal way of cooking all fish. But for variety, there are other practical ways of cooking particular kinds of fish.

Baking Is Good Method

Baking is a commendable method, for it, too, retains the best qualities of the flavor and the value of the fish itself, prevents fish-cooking odors from invading the house, and requires less watching than broiling.

In buying fish, estimate that one pound of solid flesh, free from bones, will serve three persons. Children should be urged to cultivate a taste for fish if they do not naturally like it. It's an easily digested food rich in phosphorus as well as its other nutrients and very satisfying. Broiled, baked or steamed fish, served with lemon juice, should find a place in a child's diet at least twice a week during the spring months when meals are gradually becoming "lighter" and lower in heat-producing foods.

The sauce served with fish has much to do with popularity. A fish sauce should make a contrast in color and texture and add piquancy and tone to the natural fish flavor without destroying it.

The fish laid in fat can be served with a rich sauce, while the fat fish should have a tart relish as accessory.
