

MODERN BRIDE 'TRAVELS LIGHT' WITH HER HOPE CHEST

Styles Shift Rapidly in China, Linen

BY JULIA BLANSARD
NEA Service Writer

NEW YORK, May 5.—The old-fashioned bride used to reckon her hope chest of household linen, china and silverware at the maximum quantity she could beg, borrow or steal from her dad.

The modern bride's hope chest, like the modern bride, travels light. It is considered smart indeed to trim down its contents to the minimum that furnishes comfort, beauty and enough to entertain with.

Of course there are reasons. First, seasonal changes in styles and colors of linens, china, glassware. Second, lack of space to store a great quantity even if you did crave it. Third, the possibility of moving about a great deal dispenses with the need permanent abodes used to have for quantities of this and that.

Today's bride, if she hasn't figured out just what she needs, might be helped by this table: For every bed in the new house or apartment, six sheets each, four pillow slips, two blankets, two spreads, one comforter or down puff.

Watch Your Colors

The new style is to have ensembles of all of these in one or two colors that go well together, such as green blankets and spread, green and apricot puffs and apricot sheets. But of course white bed linen is still preferred by the majority, and there's nothing quite like a hand-made patchwork quilt for a cover.

For every person in the new establishment, six bath towels, four hand towels, three wash cloths, one bath mat, one soiled clothes bag. For the establishment itself, at least one formal, well-elegant table cloth with preferably a dozen napkins or at least eight, four breakfast sets of gay gingham, plaid linen, cretonne, crepe, or oil cloth, with napkins to accompany them, and paper napkins for the oil cloth breakfast set; two to four lunch sets and napkins, which most young couples use for the evening meal.

New Styles in Linen Damask

When it comes to getting that extra fine set, there are such new styles in linen damask that you will be intrigued. Delicate colors with rich patterns woven in a softer or deeper tones, are perfectly beautiful.

Italian punch-worked dinner sets are rich and not so exorbitant as to be out of reach. Russian linens are having a tremendous vogue and a set of long cloth and napkins in vivid cross-stitch and open work design is very desirable.

If you are real fussy about things, you may want a lace dinner set and nothing else will satisfy you.

If you are conservative in your linen tastes, you may prefer about all white linen for your bedroom, bathroom and table. Monogrammed, of course. Monograms for table cloths should come where the server serves; napkins are preferably in the corner where they show when the napkin is folded, but they can come smack in the center where they show only by special folding.

All white monograms may be replaced by shaded and white ones, especially on the bathroom linen, where you may have gone a bit modern in having a black and white scheme.

Then Comes China

The linen aside, there is such a vast field of china to choose from that you may go astray unless you hold on to yourself. If you are fairly poor, and who isn't, you are scheming to pick some conservative, pretty colored set of six of everything you need for a small price around $5. All department stores have them.

Then you can step out and get a dessert set and coffee cups and saucers extra, or perhaps the soup set of Italian pottery, the fowl set eventually of old English hunting scenes, and so on.

The very newest in the way of china is the modern design that repeats on the china the modern motif that decorates the silver. There are several of these new china and silver ensembles on the market this June, all of them modern and charming.

One of them uses a platinum design of a green china of dull green color. The flat plates and saucers have the modern design, highlights the platinum touches on the green china. Used on a green damask cloth, of two tones or of green and pearl white, it makes a beautiful picture indeed.

One of the most inexpensive ways to get variety on the table is to plane one course at least in crystal. Start with it, or finish with it, or serve the salad course on it.

The very newest crystal is that in wisteria shade, which is perfectly lovely if it goes well with what you have. If not, there are greens, rubies and beautiful clear designs.

BY MRS. WALTER FERGUSON

IN his address at Stockholm, Sinclair Lewis spoke of a certain type of American literature which was "sunny and full of song and virtue."

The American home is flooded with this kind of reading matter. And it is one of the most deadly of all the evil influences that long have affected girls.

Romance in all its varied forms is to be found in this sort of writing. It contains nothing Rabelaisian, nothing bold, nothing of bad form. In all things it is eminently proper.

Yet it is indecent and immoral, since it presents life as it never has been and as it never can and never will be. It presents it, thus distorted, to girls flushed with romantic dreams and future love.

The harm, therefore, that comes from reading only this type of literature can not be overestimated.

IN the first place, and to cite its most criminal influence, whether it be merely sweet and innocuous, or whether it be clever and witty, it always assumes that man is perpetually and everywhere aware of woman. It teaches that life should be one long romance for us and that each day should be filled to the brim with love making.

Thus it deceives and misleads. The truth is that men are not at all as these romances present them. Girls, therefore, are given an entirely false idea of courtship, of marriage, of business and domestic life.

They are filled with a sex consciousness that retards their proper development and that is likely to make them shunned rather than sought by men.

If we want to save our girls, we must deal with facts. Such sticky sentimentalism is ruinous to them as it has been fatal to countless women before them.

Romantic love is only one of the splendid experiences that life offers to women. There are many others equally important.

What's in Fashion? Smartly Trimmed Hat Brims

Directed By AMOS PARRISH

NEW YORK, May 5.—Brimful of smartness! Hats seen these May days are certainly all of that. Because it's their brims that make so many of them so full of smartness.

And one of the smartest things about these spring brimmed hats is this—they don't cover up the eyes and they don't cover up the hair, as brimmed hats used to do. Not even when they turn down all around.

Some of the newest brimmed hats you'd hardly think of as brimmed at all. Because the brims turn away from the face sharply, with never a suggestion of shading.

Caught up in front over one eye is one of the most daring kinds to wear. At the point where it turns the sharpest, the brim will be caught with a bow or a flower or a twisted knot.

Show the Profile

Viewed from the side, many of these hats actually show the whole profile of the face, despite their brims. And that's why, when you try them on, you want to examine them carefully sideview as well as front-view.

The brims of hats like these are usually of milan or baku straw. The crowns may be of straw, too, but newer is the crocheted crown.

And newest of all is the white crocheted crown with the navy or black straw brim.

You can see one of these with lacy crocheted crown. And there's another hat with brim caught up by a twisted knot or ribbon.

Another very different and fashionable kind of brimmed hat is one that was sponsored by Reboux and Talbot, the Paris milliners.

It has a narrow brim turned up sharply at the left side—so sharply that almost the entire left side of the head shows. It's a good example of the profile type.

If you wear this hat, as so many fashionable women are doing, it means taking more care of at least the left side of your coiffure than you've ever taken before!

Last summer you heard much talk about sailor hats and some women wore them. This year lots more women are wearing sailors.
