THREE FAMED ARTISTS CLASH ON BEAUTY

Ideal Types Are Cited by Experts

NEW YORK, June 8.—What standard governs woman's beauty? Is it face, figure, personality, or a combination of the priceless three? Three New York artists have gone into a huddle to decide the question. It is important, because these artists are the judges who have been selected to officiate at the American Beauty Congress in New York next week.

But thus far, each one of them sees beauty from a different angle.

Rolf Armstrong thinks it's the face, with classic profile like that of Evelyn Brent.

Irvin Chidloff holds fast to the personality idea, but refuses to name the woman whom he thinks best embodies it.

John Held Jr., is strong for the irresistible combination, personified, to his way of thinking, by Greta Garbo.

"Girls Are Too Tall"

Held prefers them shorter than they often are. Yet he is interested in every type of beauty.

"But save me from the very tall woman," he said, "at least the woman who is taller than I am." The artist stands six feet.

"There really ought to be a law," he added, "against so much growing. The typical American woman, and there is a typical American woman, is growing so tall that lots of men can't stretch themselves high enough to get a look over her head."

Held isn't going to be held down to any standards when he goes out to pick a beauty. He may be tall, if not too tall, or short. She may represent any type. But on one thing he insists—she must not be over-plump.

"With me the Venus figure is taboo. Venus was really a fat woman. And who can picture her in modern clothes? The standards set in ancient times are not the standards of today."

Sticks to Greek Standard

Armstrong, who spends his days drawing lovely ladies, came right back at Held with his pet theory that "ancient" classical standards of proportion govern beauty, that the more perfect the beauty the more exactly it conforms to the Greek standard.

He believes that Held is wrong again with his combination idea. It is his opinion that "if the face is sufficiently lovely it will dominate defects of figure. And since beauty is composed of such definite things as structure, texture, and color, it can be affected only slightly by personality."

"Blond, brunet or red head may be supreme," he declared. "It all depends on how closely she approximates the idea of her particular type. However, I have observed that ultimate perfection is more often approached by brunets than by the other types."

Eyes Not Everything

Souful eyes won't count much with him when he begins judging. For, he says, "A beautiful mouth is rarer and more desirable than beautiful eyes. Miraculous construction and mechanism can make almost any eyes beautiful to some degree, but the character that is revealed by the pose of the head or a certain gleam in the walk."

"Soft, curving lines are the essence of femininity. Excessive thinness produces angularity, a masculine characteristic directly opposed to femininity allure."

Chidloff, artist-photographer who looks at the beauty question through the eyes of a Russian who has lived many years in America, has an idea that both Held and Armstrong are dead wrong.

He Prefers "It"

The "it" woman will score with him. "An exquisite face and a perfect figure mean nothing at all to me," he declared, "if the spark of personality is lacking."

"When I set out to judge a beauty, I shall look for more essential things, the brain, the character that is revealed by the pose of the head or a certain gleam in the walk."

"To me nothing else counts when that thing Americans call 'it' is lacking."

What's in Fashion?

Hats for Sunshades

Directed By AMOS PARRISH

NEW YORK, June 8.—"Most everybody who's fashionable is going to carry a sunshade with her this summer. A sunshade hat, a big enough to protect the eyes from the glare."

You're going to like them, too. No matter how much you're addicted to close-fitting, brimless turbans. You can't help it, because they're so feminine. Even the most tailored ones that you wear with your simplest tennis dress are soft and frame-like. They make such becoming outlines round the face and cast becoming, cool shadows over the eyes.

They don't cover the eyes—because that isn't fashion's way any more. Even when the brim droops way, way down, as some of the largest ones do, the sunshade hat is made to go on at an angle that shows at least one side of the profile.

Sunshade hats are fashionable with any kind of costume you can think of. Not just garden party or beach hats. But street hats, sports hats, afternoon hats.

One of the best . . . because it's usable with so many different costumes . . . is the panama with the crease down the center of the crown (like a man's hat) and a simple grosgrain band around the crown.

And the folks wearing them are so cool-headed that you're going to see many more this summer.

They look great with print dresses, especially when the ribbon band matches one of the colors in the print. They're fine with summer suits and silk coats.

The Panama type of straw is formal enough for summer town wear, yet it's not too formal to be worn with spectator sports costumes. All in all, you'll find it a practical "buy."

Ballbuntis Are Good

Medium large ballbuntis make another good street and town hat and sunshade when they are trimmed with just a ribbon band around the crown.

These you can have in darker colors, too, if you want them to go with the fashionable dark, sheer material dresses.

If your sports wardrobe contains dresses of linen or pique, the sunshade hat that goes with them is one of stitched linen or pique.

The stitching keeps the brim stiff enough so it doesn't flop, but it's still soft enough to make that becoming uneven line around the face.

Good for Week-Ends

One of these in white, with an assortment of ribbon bands in colors to match your dresses, is a good thing to have for week-ends and vacations.

The newest sports hat with the sunshade idea is of "cordknit," a loosely woven, meshy cotton that makes you think of a heavy ratine.

It's made into simple hats with a bright sash-like ribbon tied around the crown and the edge of the brim fringed. Quite informal, as you can see in the illustration. And just as smart whether it's white or a bright color.

For afternoon use, these sunshade hats grow larger. Big capelines and cartwheels are made of both rough and smooth straws, in either dull or shiny finish. Of organies, too.

Front Wider Than Back

Usually the front is much wider than the back. Sometimes the crown is creased in telescope fashion, as it is in the sketch at the left.

It's right—if ever—that these new larger hats are worn perfectly straight on the head. And that's one reason that makes them so much more becoming.

Pulled down over one eye and up over the other to show plenty of hair is the way to put them on. And which eye is up and which down depends on which is the more becoming to you.

Fresh Fruits

It is a mistake not to use fresh fruits and berries as they come into the market. Sponge cake topped with berries and served with whipped cream is a delectable dessert. While of eggs, beaten up with raspberries, and with sugar added when stiff, makes a beautiful and dainty last touch to a meal.
