Pretty Norma Kent, 20-year-old secretary to a law office, meets MARK TRAVERS, son of F. M. TRAVERS, millionaire. The young man is a bit of a scamp, but Norma is smitten. Her father has sworn to cut Mark off with a penny if the marriage takes place.

Mark, however, is a man of the world, and did not know during the courtship that he was a millionaire's son.

The story opens in Marlboro, middle western town, where the Traverses, with whom Norma shared an apartment, and BRADLEY HART, Chris' grandfather, live.

Before this, Norma has refused to marry Mark. Father has been a lawyer of whom she is fond as a friend.

Mark sells his expensive roadster to get a new one, and Norma and Mark go to fashionable Blue Springs. While there, a young man takes a fancy to Norma, and she is forced to leave.

Mark introduces her to HOLLIS STONE, an old friend, and it is evident from the girl's discomposure that she has known him before. For the reason, she also fears him. She tries to convince Mark to leave him.

One night Mark joins a car, and does not return until 3 a.m. He admits he has been drinking, but the young couple have only what is in Norma's purse.

Next day, they face the problem of getting enough money together to pay their hotel bill. Norma goes to her mother, wires her mother, and waits impatiently for a reply. Just before dinner the following evening a bell boy hands him a message.

The hot tears stung her cheeks. They would not stop. She did her face in her hands.

"Aw, sweetheart—please! You mustn't feel badly, Norma!" Sight of the girl looking so miserable seemed to clear Mark's brain. "Why, it's going to be all right. We aren't going to go hungry or anything like that."

"I'll get some money tomorrow," he stumped on, trying to comfort her, using awkward endearments and pinching her shoulder.

Her need of him acted like a plunge into cold, clear water. With surprising quickness, the befuddled vanished.

"But, Mark—I'm not crying about the—the money!"

WHEN she returned Mark, vastly improved by a cold shower and shave, had nearly completed dressing. She opened the box of soda, measured out the dose for him and brought a glass of water. He gulped it down.

Frowning faintly, Mark said, "I seem to remember from last night that the Traverses finances are rather less than low. Wiped out, as it were. Right?"

"Let's not bother about that, Mark, until you feel more like yourself. You'll have some breakfast won't you?"

"What time is it?" She told him it was a quarter of twelve. "Maybe we'd better have something sent up," the girl suggested.

Mark should his head. "I think I'd like to get out of this place," he said. "Little air percolating through this numbskull of mine might do it some good. Suppose we walk over to the coffee shop?"

The coffee shop was an inexpensive restaurant a block and a half down the street. It was open day and night, and the food was excellent. Norma agreed to the suggestion and pulled on her hat.

"You're certainly looking O. K. this morning," Mark told her a little later when they were out on the street. "Never guess you were awake until the wee small hours!"

She brightened before his compliments. What if she had tossed sleeplessly long after Mark had been deep in slumber? What if for two hours that morning she had been scheming and studying over pencil and paper trying to find the answer to their difficulties?

"When Halloran spoke to this game tonight I thought I'd have a chance to run the $400 up. I get really win at bridge, but this was poker. Added to what I've lost on golf—oh, Lord, am I sleepy!"

His wrist watch indicated that it was after 3:30.

"We'll find a way out of this tomorrow," Norma predicted cheerfully. "And we do have a little left, Mark."

She arose and got her purse from a drawer of the dressing table. There were five crisp $10 bills and several $1's inside.

"Lots of people have built fortunes on less than that," she told him. "Of course we can't stay here any longer. We'll have to move—"

Travers was not listening. He had stripped off his coat and taken up the pajamas laid out for him.

A moment later the bathroom door closed behind him and Norma heard the rush of water in the tub.

With a sigh she turned her head on the pillow and closed her eyes.

IT was noon next day before Mark was awake. He sat on the edge
