BY BEN STERN

AN already scrambled Chinese puzzle was given another twist today when the name of Meredith Nicholson, famous Indianapolis novelist and essayist, was tossed into the Democratic senatorial tangle by friends both here and over the state.

Nicholson was noncommittal over the possibility that he may become a candidate for the post in the state convention next June.

"I have nothing to say, nor will I discuss the matter," he declared. Friends, however, eagerly proffered the information that he would not turn a deaf ear to ambition.

If his name does go before the convention it will be the seventh in the rapidly growing list, which includes Evans Woollen, Albert Stump, Walter Myers, all of Indianapolis; Lew O'Bannon of Corydon, Samuel Clelland of Ft. Wayne, and John A. M. Adams of Portland.

Indications are that Nicholson will make no contest for delegates, but that his name will be used in event of a deadlock, which looms at present.

It is a matter of record that, although preoccupied with his literary labors, Nicholson has found time to take a prominent part in Democratic activities.

In 1924, when the Republicans almost everywhere were swept into office by large majorities, he was Democratic nominee for state senator and led the legislative ticket, although also defeated.

Then in 1927, when the members of the city administration either were ousted or indicted, Nicholson was appointed a member of the reform city council.

At the Seventh district reorganization meeting in 1930 he was elected Seventh district Democratic chairman.

Nicholson also was offered an important diplomatic post by President Wilson.

One of the outstanding liberals in Indiana, Nicholson will attract those with a similar bent who will be delegates to the convention, and his name, distinguished as it is, would no doubt prove a drawing card on the state ticket.

There is a decided movement toward the liberal point of view, both in his party and over the state.

Usual comment regarding many of the others mentioned is: "He is too conservative."

This, at least, never could be said of the Hoosier author.

GUAYAQUIL, Ecuador, Nov. 13.—The government of President Alfredo Basquerio Moreno concentrated troops in the Guayaquil area today to stamp out a serious revolt in southern Ecuador.

The Chimborazo battalion at Riobamba, between Guayaquil and Quito, the capital, was reported to have joined the revolt but the report could not be confirmed. The government contended that all of the country was quiet except in Oro province.

SHOOTING STARS TO BE WATCHED NEXT 4 NIGHTS

Astronomers Ask Help of Amateurs in Checking Leonid Meteors.

By Science Service
PHILADELPHIA, Nov. 13.—All during November, but especially starting Saturday and continuing through next Tuesday, astronomers everywhere with the assistance of thousands of volunteer observers will watch for a sight of the Leonid meteors or shooting stars.

Though some of these meteors, which seem to emerge from the constellation of Leo, the lion, are seen every November, the display last year was better than for nearly a third of a century previously.

Astronomers who make a specialty of meteor study are hoping that this may prove to have been the forerunner of a magnificent "shower" in the next few years, comparable with those of 1833 and 1866. In those years the entire sky was covered with shooting stars by the thousands.

Earth to Cross Swarm
Meteors are best seen in the early morning sky, because then the meteors hit us head on. In the evening hours they must catch up with us.

The swarm of Leonids forms an elliptical ring nearly two billion miles long, but, though there are some meteors all around this ring, at one point they are particularly concentrated. Each meteor in the swarm moves around this ring once in a little over thirty-three years.

The earth crosses the swarm in November, so that some of the meteors are intercepted, and, as they are burned by friction with the earth's atmosphere, the shooting stars are seen in the sky. In the years of the great showers the earth hit squarely the concentrated part of the stream.

Believed "Kin" of Comets

Though the origin of meteors is not accounted for fully, it seems certain that they are closely associated with comets. In many cases a swarm of meteors has appeared in the same path as a comet that had disappeared.

The Leonid meteors, for instance, follow almost exactly the path of Temple's comet. Probably both comets and meteors are some of the debris left over from the time when the planets were formed of material pulled from the sun by the gravitational attraction of a passing star.

Dr. Charles P. Olivier of the University of Pennsylvania, Philadelphia, is one of the leading authorities on meteors and heads the American Meteor Society, made up largely of amateurs who co-operate with the professionals in observing these wanderers.

Number Is Desired

He has asked for assistance from every one in securing data on the Leonids this month.

Most important of the desired information is the number of meteors seen during half-hourly intervals.

This can be obtained by simply counting those seen from midnight to 12:30, 12:30 to 1:00, and so on.

The times of passing clouds or anything else that may hinder a sight of the meteors should be noted. Leo, the constellation from which they seem to radiate, is directly east in the early morning hours and is recognized by the familiar "sickle," a group of stars shaped like that agricultural implement.
