Observation Squadron Ships Will Track Fleeing Criminals.

Radio-equipped airplanes, which can shift to instructions from headquarters like cruising squadrons, today were made a weapon of police force.

Under a joint program announced by Chief Mike Morrissey and Major Richard Taylor of the Indiana national guard, today, four airplanes, all radio-equipped, will be available for emergency flights at all times of the day and night at Stout field in Mars Hill, base of the One hundred thirtieth observation squadron.

Pilots and co-pilots attached to the national guard field, will be subject to call when airport authorities are informed by police of crimes.

Relay Information

Morrissey instructed captains of all shifts to utilize the planes to track down criminals fleeing to and from the city.

By use of wireless, the planes constantly will be in touch with the base.

Information of the fugitive's trail will be relayed to the airport by police, and the message will be telegraphed there to the plane in flight. Morrissey predicted the system will prove invaluable in the apprehension of criminals, particularly in cases where the route of the escaping criminal is known. Such cases often occur, and in the past squadrons, stationed on main roads leading from the city, were used to pursue the fugitives.

Flag Tests Work

Tests of the plane system in capture of criminals were conducted more than two years ago, it was recalled.

At that time, flags were used to convey messages between plane and the police emergency car.

In these tests, flying field attaches were notified that a mythical criminal was fleeing by auto on a main road leading from the city.

At the same time, the message was given to the emergency squad, and the airplane and the police car set out in pursuit.

"Chases" in several tests resulted in "spotting" of the fugitive's automobile from the air. The co-pilot relayed the direction and locations of the fugitive's car to the emergency squad by flag signals, thus directing the chase from the air.

Alleged Killers of Chain Stores Head Facing Fight for Lives.

By Times Special

LEBANON, Ind., Jan. 7.—With the death penalty mandatory upon conviction, Charles V. Witt and Louis Hamilton will go on trial in Boone circuit court here Monday charged with the murder in Indianapolis last May of Lafayette Jackson, chain grocery operator, during a robbery. The case will be tried here on a change of venue from Marion county.

Final details for the trial were completed at a conference in Indianapolis of Ben Scifres, Boone county prosecutor, and Prosecutor Herbert Wilson, Marion county, and his chief deputy, Floyd Matlack.

Judge John W. Hornaday, who will preside, plans to call a special venire of thirty-five for prospective jury duty. If a panel is not obtained, small groups will be called as needed, rather than many at one time, due to a desire to keep down cost of the trial.

Ira S. Holmes, Indianapolis attorney, who is chief defense counsel, came here to present a petition to Judge Hornaday asking that Witt and Hamilton be transferred from Marion county jail to Indianapolis to Lebanon, but took no further action when Scifres assured him that counsel would be given full opportunity for conferences with the prisoners. This splendid remedy has six times the strength of ordinary cough medicines and may be taken full strength or be diluted with simple sugar syrup or honey.
