Missionaries Responsible for Chinese Wars, Speaker Says

"The Chinese revolution was hastened by American missionaries," said Frederick Moore, former press correspondent at a luncheon in his honor Friday at Indianapolis Athletic Club. Moore spoke earlier at English's theater on the Town hall program.

"Through their efforts, firebrands were educated who thought they could set up a new government by destroying the existing one. China was not ready for a revolution," he added.

"The average missionary is not qualified to undertake an international political interpretation such as he does," Moore said, although he gave them credit for individual educational work and in medical aid.

Assaults Student Movement Moore branded as false the impression given Americans by returned missionaries in statements that China is adopting American manners and customs.

"Education of women particularly is only beginning," he said. The student movement he described as "contemptible," and showing the weakness of university faculties.

Talks on Japan Criticizing the American's pro-China attitude, he recalled that no action was taken when Mongolia was annexed by the Soviet republic.

"Japan, although not rich, is progressive. To feed its own people, Japan must have raw materials from South Manchuria and needs goods. Because of China's dependence Chinese boycotts are only temporary."

Moore was introduced by S. P. Ochiltree. At the speaker's table were Moore and Ochiltree were Mrs. Mary McNitt, Mrs. Dorothy Reynolds Collins, J. P. Edmison, Wallace O. Lee and William Fox Jr.
