A black and white woolen ensemble with a white crepe blouse, like the one sketched above, is sufficiently utilitarian for an over-cast day. It will not crush, and it is of neutral color without being dull.

BY PRUNELLA WOOD

THE knowing woman puts at least one smart costume away for a rainy day. She knows that running between the raindrops in bedraggled clothes of uncertain vintage and no weatherproof qualities is not an attractive stunt, and she has something snappy saved up for just such occasions.

There is nothing like tweed for misty, moisty weather. The tweed ensemble is almost a national woman's costume in England, because of the perennial wet weather, and it is just as trustworthy over here besides being more becomingly tailored as a rule. This spring it will be even more simple than usual to add a tweed costume to one's wardrobe, for the shops are full of them in a large price range.

The swaggar coat at the left above covers all but a few inches of the costume beneath it, and it buttons high at the throat and is snug at the wrists. It is of dark brown checked woolen, and the frock it covers is of loosely woven orange tweed. At the right is another jacket, skirt and top coat of medium brown checked woolen and a big sweater.

Many of the new spring woolen ensembles have three pieces. Thus the jacket and skirt which does very well on a sunny day becomes a perfect costume for a dripping day, when its top coat of deep cape is slipped on over it.

A cheering spot of color to brighten into such an ensemble by blouse, jumper or scarf. A fuchsia crepe blouse looks swell with a gray coat and skirt, and per-venche blue accents tobacco brown surprisingly well.
