POSTURE DEFECTS CORRECTED IN CLASS AT JUNIOR HIGH

Pupils of the class at the start of every school year are not only recorded by names, but also are profile silhouettes which show the type of posture of each. In addition they are given the plumb line test to check whether the ears, shoulders, hips, knees and ankle joints fall in straight, vertical line.

Anita Key, director of the physical education class, then works the pupils who have posture defects, and with the use of corrective exercises many of the defects are overcome.

At the end of the year another picture is taken of the pupils, and this is compared with the first.

Statistics prove that boys show more physical defects than girls, with the exception of flat feet, and that girls are more interested in correcting the defects.

It also has been proven that pupils in the seventh grade have more physical defects than pupils in the eighth and ninth grades.
