A BOOK A DAY

BY BRUCE CATTON

These are trying times, and anything that can make you laugh is pretty welcome. I believe you will find a gratifying number of laughs in "So This Is Science!" by H. F. Ellis.

This little book is something along the line of last year's birth-producer, "1066 and All That." It seems, that is, to be a series of scientific observations written by a genial lunatic. Some examples may give you the idea:

"Schnapps was a German professor who constructed a giant infometer with which he hoped to upset the laws of gravity and create a disturbance in the solar system. However, he was arrested on a charge of impiety on the eve of his experiment and imprisoned for twenty years. When he came out his nerves were so shattered that he converted the machine into a hat-rack and retired to private life."

"The actual figure in tons (the weight of the earth), is too long for inclusion in this little book, out it begins with a six and has roughly as many naughts as there are wheels in a good train of rather exceptional length."

"Australians carry their young in pouches . . . and export frozen meat and wool in change for commodities, of which they are very fond. Sheep dipping is the leading industry."

And so on; nonsensical and pleasantly amusing. It's published by Dutton and sells for $1.75.

BEER SALE IS BRISK IN FAR WEST STATES

Saloons Operate in Reno; Business Good in Denver, Helena and Frisco.

This is the last of four stories, based on a nation-wide survey, describing the return of legalized beer in different sections of the country.

BY JOHN M. GLEISSNER
NEA Service Writer

Denver, Reno, Helena, San Francisco, and other cities in the great open spaces of the west have resumed their beer-drinking on an old-time scale.

Colorado, in particular, has gone in for beer in a big way. Reno has old-time saloons, swinging doors and all. Many localities are getting sizable revenues from taxes, but with the exception of Colorado and California there appears to have been little increase in employment.

The Colorado state treasury has received thus far about $85,000 from license fees, counties about $25,000, and towns and cities over $100,000.

Many Get Jobs

It is estimated that 1,000 Coloradans got jobs as soon as beer was legal, and that others have gone back to work since. A canvass of sixteen places serving beer in Denver showed eighty-two additional employees at work.

Three breweries are operating in the state, and eastern brewers are negotiating for construction of a new $1,000,000 plant.

Border counties near dry Kansas and dry Nebraska have difficulty in getting enough beer to meet the demand.

The Colorado law made no provision for local option, but several localities have had "bone dry" ordinances for years and courts have ruled that these apply to beer.

High Price Retards Sales

In Montana the price of beer has been high—25 cents a pint—and there have been complaints against its alcoholic content and quality. This has kept down consumption. Two breweries are operating in the state.

License fees have brought Montana more than $160,000 and local jurisdictions another $100,000.

It is not expected that the beer business will help employment greatly until breweries are going full blast and quality has been improved. No county has as yet attempted to exercise local option.

Beer sale became legal in Arizona, June 14. In Phoenix 250 licenses brought $10,000 to the city. Police officials of Tucson and Phoenix, the two principal cities, report a decrease in bootlegging.

Saloon Flourishes in Nevada

Nevada has no state law regulating beer, so the old-time saloon has returned with cities in control. Many speakeasies have been driven out of business.

There has been little increase in employment, since many beer bars are manned by persons who had worked in speakeasies. Police records show a decrease in arrests for drunkenness and drunken driving.

Reno now has about 100 places selling beer, sixty of which are classed as saloons, and has collected about $10,000 in license fees. There are about 450 places selling beer in the state.

Nevada law provides for local option, but no community has invoked this section.

No Law in Washington

Like Nevada, Washington has no state law regulating beer. Cities and counties may issue licenses and impose taxes, but the amounts collected so far have not been tabulated.

Several hundred men were given work renovating old breweries in Tacoma and Seattle, and a new brewery is being built at Olympia. Farmers are planting larger acreage in hops to meet a growing demand.

Beer is sold openly in Albuquerque and elsewhere in New Mexico, but revenue schemes have not been devised. Judge Milton Helmick of the Albuquerque district has ruled that 3.2 beer is not intoxicating in fact. The state will vote Sept. 19 on beer and repeal.

Utah Clamors for Beer

Bone-dry Utah, surrounded on every side by beer states, is experiencing a clamor for the legalization of beer. The Idaho legislature recently formed the last link in the circle of wet territory by rushing through a beer bill at a special session.

California taxes beer at 2 cents a gallon, and is collecting at the rate of $800,000 a year. The state has had little racketeering, but numerous hard liquor speakeasies have been forced out of business by legalized beer.

Six breweries are operating in the state and business has picked up noticeably in many lines.

THE END.

Pickens announced that other attorneys also would be selected during the vacation, each serving a ten-day period.

By United Press
LAFAYETTE, Ind., July 6.—Plans for construction of a $23,000 swimming pool and a $535,051 sewage system here through a federal loan have been approved by the city council.

The sewer could be built for $401,268 by machinery, but it is hoped to furnish as much hand labor as possible.
