Huge Reservoir Contains Sufficient Natural Gas for Southern Indiana

Upper Left—Drilling crew and rig on Steele No. 2 gas well, which came in at 16,000,000 cubic feet a day, open flow.
Upper Right—S. C. Sampley No. 2 well, with a volume of 14,000,000 cubic feet a day.

Lower—J. E. Bauer, Vincennes, who is leading the development of the southwestern Indiana gas field.

develop a portion of this territory sufficient to convince the best known gas engineers in the nation that the Indiana field is of potential large capacity.

More than three and a half million dollars already have been invested in pipe lines, gathering lines, gas wells, and a pay roll of approximately $50,000 a month is being spent in the tested sections, it is said. In addition, farmers in these counties are drawing approximately another $50,000 a month in lease rentals with one-eighth of the field price of the gas, records reveal.

Report on Production

A large eighteen-inch line is planned, branching off from the Kentucky natural gas line in the north end of Knox county and following the approximate north bank of the west fork of White river, to serve Indianapolis.

From wells already drilled in this field, approximately twelve million cubic feet of gas a day can be delivered to pipe lines, and according to reports of gas engineers, fifty million cubic feet a day can be developed from steady and settled production. This production comes from wells averaging around 1,700 feet in depth, and according to surveys of these gas engineers another hundred million feet a day can be developed from deeper strata.

Deterioration Is Slight

Maurice J. Dewey, Mt. Vernon, O., noted gas engineer, asserted that with construction of an eighteen-inch pipe line from the field into Indianapolis, fifty million cubic feet of gas could be delivered into Indianapolis daily, without pumping.

Dr. Logan, who is the head of the Indiana university geology department as well as being state geologist, has written several books and drawn graphs representing the geological formations in this field as well as other parts of Indiana.

"I think these wells with proper care will show a long life and some of the wells in the field which have been in production for some years show little signs of deterioration," Dr. Logan said.

Based on engineers' estimates the consumption of gas by all southern Indiana cities, including Evansville and Indianapolis, would be approximately 7,720,000 cubic feet annually. The Indianapolis consumption alone is estimated at five billion cubic feet annually.

Geologically speaking, Gibson county is at the bottom of a hole almost a mile deep, and is the vortex of this vast gas field. What is known in geological parlance as the Cincinnati arch, is an outcropping of Trenton rock which extends from Kentucky along the Indiana-Ohio line to the Great Lakes.

The Cincinnati arch is approximately 500 feet above sea level at Cincinnati. East of this rock ridge lie the Ohio and West Virginia gas fields. West, the rock drops with such suddenness that in Gibson county the Trenton rock is 4,500 feet below sea level, according to Dr. Logan's book on this subject. Just west of the Indiana-Illinois state line the rock rises again in what is known as an anticline. Geologists say there are twenty-two structures from which gas may be obtained in the Indiana field above the 1,700-foot-depth mark. And each structure has many producing sands, some as many as thirteen sands in which gas is found.

The Indiana field extends westward over the Illinois line into southeastern Illinois where there already have been developed heavy production.
