Eviction of Stand Owners
Delinquent Halted
by Courts.

Members of the city legal staff were in conference today regarding the next step to be taken by the safety board in its fight to collect more than $9,000 in back rentals from scores of standholders on the city market.

Many of the standholders are delinquent since the first of 1932, and have ignored attempts of the board of safety and Captain Otto Ray, chief license collector to collect.

Stopped in the most direct method ever employed by the city in its attempts to obtain rentals, that of evicting standholders who fail to pay, city officials fear that they have "lost face" in the fight.

Pauses After Eviction
The standholders were removed Friday, but one of them, Henry Greensburg, despite his plea to Captain Ray that he could not pay, rushed to the city controller's office and made payments amounting to $81.41 before his property could be unloaded from a truck at the storage house.

Safety board members, including President Charles Meyers, Donald Morris and Frank Dalley, are of the opinion that the city has "been too liberal" with the standholders and that they in turn have "taken advantage of the present conditions."

After a conference with Mayor Reginald H. Sullivan and safety board members, Captain Ray was instructed to proceed with the evictions.

Restrained by Court
However, the next standholder on the list was Joseph O'Mahoney, former president of the market association. A check was being made of his stock prior to removal by Captain Ray and three patrolmen, when James E. Deery, city attorney, caused them to stop proceedings.

An injunction is pending in the supreme court, it was learned, that specifically enjoins the city of Indianapolis from interfering in Mr. O'Mahoney's case.

However, the city's action did obtain results. Almost $400 was taken in at the city controller's office from twenty-one standholders shortly after removal proceedings started.

WALKATHON TO BE SHUT TODAY,
POLICE DECLARE

Morrissey Makes Plans to Halt Show, Arrest Operators.

Last-minute legal subterfuges notwithstanding, Police Chief Mike Morrissey was preparing at noon today to arrest the operators and close the Walkathon at the state fairground at 3:30 p. m.

So advised by Herbert Spencer, assistant city attorney, Chief Morrissey's decision followed denial by Superior Judge Clarence E. Weir of a restraining order directed at the city police.

Petition for the restraining order was filed by Jacob Weiss, attorney for the Walkathon operators, and was designed to prevent enforcement of a new city ordinance which became effective at noon today.

The ordinance defined marathon exhibitions as those lasting more than twelve hours. The ordinance would have permitted an arrest at noon, but Chief Morrissey decided to add on the rest periods time so there would be no question about legality of the closing.

Would Impair Contracts
Senator Weiss had charged in his petition for a restraining order that the council ordinance was an ex post facto proceeding, and would impair contracts into which the Walkathon operators had entered in good faith. He revealed that the Walkathon was expected to last at least two months more if allowed to continue without molestation by the city authorities.

Judge Weir today declared in denying the petition for a restraining order that the ex post facto question was not involved and that the city council has a right to limit such exhibitions.

The question of health is involved, the court held, by reason of the Walkathon's action in having a physician in attendance. That fact alone indicates that the health problem is involved, the court ruled.

Will Give "Exhibitions"
Operators of the Walkathon have no right to conduct an exhibition of "exhaustion," the court held.

Operators and counsel of the Walkathon had decided on a plan to discontinue the council ordinance, if Judge Weir denied the restraining order petition.

They had decided to stage a series of "exhibitions" in which the contestants would be limited to those who have been participating. The "exhibitions" would have run less than the twelve-hour ordinance definitions.

Spectators would have been given passport checks, the contestants taken off the floor for a half-hour and a "new" exhibition started. The winner of the $1,000 prize money would have been the contestant who entered the most exhibitions.

This plan was to be followed this afternoon, in spite of Chief Morrissey's arrest threat, it was reported.
