

STATE RELIEF PROMISED BY CWA OFFICER

NEW MARINE CHIEF

STENOGRAPHERS NOT PROTECTED BY STATE LAW

Alleged 'Sweatshop' Expose at Capitol Reveals Hoosier Laxity.

Disclosure of what has been termed "sweatshop" conditions of employment of piece-work stenographers at the statehouse directed attention today to the fact that Indiana has no law to protect such workers.

Authorities in the state health department and the state industrial board both declared that their jurisdiction extends only to women employed in industry, that is—factory workers.

Stenographers and other clerical workers can be employed in any sort of unventilated room and for any number of hours without the employer running afoul of the Hoosier law.

This lack of progressive legislation has been repeatedly pointed out in various surveys covering employment of women in the state, but nothing ever is done about it by the legislature, it was said.

The statehouse criticism has been leveled against employment of a group of girls on the "speed-up" plan of piece work in an unventilated basement room without outside walls.

It also has been charged that these workers have been violating the NRA code in the matter of both long hours and short pay. They are employed directly by the state under the office of the adjutant-general, but in the name of the Indiana State Normal at Terre Haute. The layout is part of the new multi-graphing department installed to do much of the state printing.
